THE BELEAGUERED CITY.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

I've read in some old, wondrous tale—
Some legend strange and vague,
That a midnight host of spectres pale
Beleaguered the walls of Prague.

Beside the Moldau's rushing stream,
With the wan moon overhead,
There stood, as in an awful dream,
The army of the dead.

White as a sea-fog landward bound,
The spectral camp was seen;
And with a sorrowful, deep sound,
The river flowed between.

No other voice nor sound was there—
No drum, nor sentry's pace;
The mist-like banners clasp'd the air,
As clouds with clouds embrace.

But when the old cathedral bell
Proclaimed the morning prayer,
The white pavilions rose and fell
On the alarmed air!

Down the broad valley, fast and far,
The troubled army fled;
Up rose the glorious morning star—
The ghastly host was dead!

I've read in the wondrous heart of man—
That strange and mystic scroll—
That an army of phantoms vast and wan,
Beleaguer the human soul.

Encamped beside Life's rushing stream,
In Fancy's misty light,
Gigantic shapes and shadows gleam
Portentous through the night.

Upon its midnight battle ground
The spectral camp is seen;
And with a sorrowful, deep sound,
Flows the river of Life between.

No other voice nor sound is there
In the army of the grave—
No other challenge breaks the air,
But the rustling of Life's wave.

But when the solemn and deep church bell
Entreats the soul to pray,
The midnight phantoms feel the spell—
The shadows sweep away.

Down the broad vale of tears afar,
The spectral camp has fled;
Faith shineth as a morning star—
Our ghastly fears are dead.

THE RIFLE.

CHAPTER II.

It was in a log house, larger, and of rather more comfortable construction than was usually seen in that wilderness country, beside a fire that sent a broad and crackling flame half way up the capacious chimney, that there was seated, on the evening of the atrocious murder, in addition to its ordinary inmates, the young physician from whom we lately parted. His great coat, and overalls, were laid aside; and he was conversing with that agreeable fluency and pleased expression of countenance, which denoted that he was happy in the society around him. Opposite, and busily employed in knitting, sat a beautiful girl of eighteen. From her work, which seemed to engross an unusual portion of her attention, she every now and then would send a furtive glance to the guest, thus telling in the silent language of love, the tale she never could have found words to utter. We say she was beautiful; and if a complexion so clear, that

The eloquent blood spoke through her cheeks; and so distinctly wrought,
That one might almost say of her, her very body thought;

if laughing blue eyes lighted up with intelligence and affection; if smooth and glossy auburn ringlets; teeth white as the snow around her father's dwelling; and a person which, though not tall, was well formed and graceful—if all these traits combined constitute a claim to the epithet, it certainly belonged to her. She was modestly attired in a dress of no costly material; and the little feet that peeped from underneath it, were clothed in white stockings of her own fabrication, and in shoes of too coarse texture ever to have been purchased from the shelves of a fashionable city mechanic. Yet that same form had been arrayed in richer apparel, and had been followed by glances of warmer admiration, than perhaps ever fell to the share of those who are ready to condemn her on account of her simple garb.

Catharine Wentworth was the daughter (at the time of this story, the only one,) of a gentleman who had formerly been a wealthy merchant in the city of New York; but whom misfortune in business had suddenly befallen, and stripped of all his possessions. While surrounded by affluence, he had been considered remarkably meek and affable; but he become proud and unsociable in adversity; and not caring to remain among scenes that continually brought to mind the sad change in his condition, he emigrated, with his whole family, to the wilds of Illinois. He was actuated in part, no doubt, by a higher and better motive. At that time he was the father of another daughter—Louisa, older than Catharine, who was fast falling a victim to that disease which comes over the human form like autumn over the earth, imparting to it additional graces, but too truly whispering that the winter of death is nigh.—The medical attendant of the family, perhaps to favor the design which he knew Mr. Wentworth entertained, intimated that a change of climate was their only hope. If it were right in us to detain the reader, and we possessed the power of exhibiting in the melancholy sweetness of reality, the progress of that interesting female to the grave, till at length she lay down in her attenuated loveliness to awaken in heaven—all who have hearts would moisten the relation with a tear. But we will not—we cannot:

Beneath the prairie turf she lies,
And sweetest wild flowers deck the sod;
Her stainless soul has sought the skies,
To dwell forever with its God.

How strangely does the human mind accommodate itself to almost any situation: the man who had spent his life, hitherto, in a sumptuous mansion, surrounded by all those elegances and means of enjoyment, which, in a large city, are always to be procured by fortune, now experienced, in an humble log cabin, divided into but four apartments, and those of the roughest kind, a degree of happiness that he had never known before. And well he might be happy; for he was rich—not in money—but in a better, a more enduring kind of wealth. His wife, two hardy and active sons, and the remaining daughter, Catharine, were all around him, smiling in contentment, and ruddy with health. We can only estimate our condition in this life, by comparison with that of others; and his plantation was as large and as well cultivated; his crops as abundant; his stock as good as any of the settlers on that prairie. He had still a better source of consolation: Louisa's death, the quiet of the country, and the natural wish of every active mind to create to itself modes of employment, had led him more frequently to read the Scriptures, than he had found leisure to do before; and this was attended, as it always is, with the happiest result—a knowledge and love of Him, "whom to know is life eternal." But I am digressing.

The family of Mr. Wentworth, with the addition of Charles Rivington, (whom indeed, we might almost speak of as one of its members; since the coming New Year's day, he was to receive the hand of "their saucy Kate," as the happy parents fondly termed her) were gathered around the fireside, conversing cheerfully on every topic that presented itself, when a light tap was heard at the door, and Mr. Rumley, the deputy sheriff of the county, entered the apartment. He apologised for his intrusion, by saying that having had business to attend to at a cabin further up the prairie, which detained him longer than he suspected, he should not be able, on account of the darkness of the night, to return to town until the following morning; he therefore hoped that he might be accommodated with a bed. His request was of course readily complied with.

He was a tall, dark person, dressed much in the manner of the unfortunate hunter, except that his leggings were of buckskin. He had but one eye, when a young man, in a scuffle with an Indian, two of whom sprang suddenly upon him from an ambush; and this, together with a deep scar on his forehead, received in a tavern brawl at New Orleans, two or three years before, and the wrinkles which age, or more likely his manner of life had ploughed, gave to his countenance a sinister and disagreeable expression. At the present time, the haggard appearance of his face was increased, either from having been a long while exposed to the cold, or from some latent sickness working on him; for his lip quivered and was of bloodless hue, and he was remarkably pale. Charles Rivington who often met him in his rides, was the first to notice the change from his usual appearance.

"You look pale and fatigued, Mr. Rumley; I hope you are not unwell."

"No, sir—that is—why yes, I do feel a little sickish; and should be glad to go to bed, if it's convenient," answered Mr. Rumley.

"Perhaps there is something that we can do for you, sir?" said the maternal Mrs. Wentworth.

"No, ma'am, I thank ye. I reckon a good night's sleep will be best for me; its what cures all my ailings." And in compliance with his wish, the guest was shown to his apartment.

One by one, the different members of this peaceful family sought their pillows, till soon Charles Rivington and the blushing Catharine were left sole occupants of the room. But though alone they were not lonely: he had many an interesting tale to whisper in the maiden's ear, (for it was almost a week since they had met!) and she, though something of a chatterbox, when none but her mother and brother were present, on this occasion betrayed a wonderful aptitude for listening. The hours glided rapidly away; and the gray morning was already advancing, when the happy young man imprinted a good night kiss upon her cheek, left her to those sweet dreams, which slumber bestows only upon the young and innocent.

CHAPTER III.

It was late in the afternoon of the following day that Charles Rivington, being returned to the town where he resided, was seated in his office, employed in counting a roll of notes, a pile of dollars lying, at the same time, on the table before him, when three men abruptly entered the apartment.

"You are our prisoner!" cried the formost of the party. "By heaven! Jim, look there; there's the very money itself. I can swear to that pouch." And here he rudely seized our hero by the collar.

"Stand back, sir, and lay hold of me at your peril," returned Charles Rivington, sternly; as, shaking the man from him he gave him a blow that sent him the other side of the office. "What is that you have to say? and if I am to be made prisoner, produce your warrant."

"You may as well submit quietly, Doctor Rivington," said another of the party, who was a constable. "You, perhaps, can explain every thing: but you must come before Squire Lawton. This is my authority, (showing a paper,) and it is only necessary to say, that suspicion rests on you, as the murderer of old Silversight, who was found shot through the head, on the road, this morning."

"Is it possible! poor old man, has he really been killed! When I parted from him last night, he was not only well, but seemed in excellent spirits," said the doctor.

"He parted from him last night! mark that, Buckhorn," said the one who had just received a severe repulse from our hero, and whose name was Carlock. "He left him in excellent spirits; mark what the villain says."

"There need be no jerring about it," replied Buckhorn. "Doctor Rivington, you tended me in my bad fever last spring, and agin when I had the chills in the fall, and you stuck by me truer than any friend I've had since my old mother died, except this 'ere rifle. I'm monstrous sorry I found it where I did. It may be so, that you've got a clear conscience yet; but whether or no, though old Silversight and me has hunted together many and many's the day, you shall have fair play anyhow, damn me if you shan't. That 'ere money looks bad; if it had been a fair fight, we might a' hushed it up some how or 'nother."

Our hero, while Buckhorn was speaking, had time to reflect that if Silversight was indeed dead, circumstances would really authorise this arrest. The rifle, which he was known to have carried with him from town, had been found, it seems, beside the murdered body. The money that the unfortunate man had entrusted to him, was discovered in his possession, and how could it be proved for what purpose it had been given to him? As these thoughts rushed rapidly through his mind, he turned to the officer, and observed.

"Mr. Pike, I yield myself your prisoner. I perceive there are some circumstances that cause suspicion to rest on me. I must rely, for a while, upon the character which, I trust, I have acquired since my residence among you, for honor and fair dealing, until I shall either be enabled to prove my innocence, or Heaven places in the hands of justice the real perpetrator of the deed."

So saying, he gathered up the money from the table, and departed with the officer and his companions, to the house of Mr. Lawton, who, being a Justice of the Peace, had issued a warrant for his apprehension.

"I have always been glad to see you heretofore, Dr. Rivington," said the magistrate, politely, on the appearance of that person before him, "and should be so now, where it not that you are charged with a crime, which, if proved, will call down the severest vengeance of the law. I hope and believe, however, that you can establish your innocence. Where were you, sir, on the afternoon of yesterday?"

"I went out to visit some patients, meaning to continue my ride as far as Mr. Buckhorn's; and took his rifle with me from the gunsmith's, with the intention of stopping and leaving it, but I met with old Mr. Silversight at the cross-roads, who was going up from the New Settlements, and he offered to take charge of it, and I gave it to him. We parted at the forks, and I crossed over to Mr. Wentworth's."

"Did Mr. Silversight continue on his journey, having Jim Buckhorn's rifle with him?" asked the Justice.

"Yes sir; but before we parted, he gave me this money," handing the notes and specie to the Magistrate, "and requested me to pay it into the land-office to-day, to clear out Mr. Richly's land. He said there was five hundred dollars in all, and I was counting it when arrested."

"There is a most unfortunate coincidence of circumstance against you, Doctor. The man is found murdered, the rifle which you were known to have carried lying near him, and you arrive in town on the next day with the money of the deceased in your possession. The poor old man's horse going home without his rider, excites alarm; Buckhorn and Carlock, with other neighbors, set out upon the track; they find the murdered victim, stark and bloody, lying on the snow, which was scarcely whiter than his aged head; they divide—some bearing the body back, while the others follow the trail; it leads them to Mr. Wentworth's, where you acknowledge you passed the night; they there enquire what person made the tracks which they had followed, and were answered it was you; they continue on your trail until you arrive in town; they make affidavit of these facts, and procure a warrant for your arrest, when to complete the chain of evidence, you are found counting the spoils of the murdered man. Now, sir, what answer can you make to these appalling circumstances?"

"They are appalling, indeed, sir," said our hero, "and I can only reply to them—I am innocent. If the poor man was murdered, the one who did it must certainly have left tracks; and I fear they have fallen upon his trail and taken it for mine. But it is in my power to prove that I had no weapon with me, except that unlucky rifle, and the gunsmith will testify that he gave me no balls with it."

"The gunsmith has already been before me," said Squire Lawton, "for I was loath to have you apprehended, except on an application backed by such proof as could not be rejected. He states that when he gave you the gun, the lock had been repaired, and polished, and that since that time it had certainly been discharged. I am sorry to do it, sir, but my duty compels me to commit you."

It is needless to dwell longer on this examination. Our hero was committed for trial, and so strong were the proofs adduced against him, that the magistrate, and, indeed, the whole neighborhood could scarce hesitate to believe him guilty. When the sun arose that morning, Charles Rivington was one of the happiest of men. Loving and beloved, his business increasing, his name respected, and the time rapidly approaching which was to bind him to his Catharine in the tender relationship of marriage—he looked back upon the glorious orb, as it burst up through the eastern heaven, with an eye of almost kindred brightness. How changed the scene at setting! its last rays fell upon him through the iron guarded window of a prison. Yet could we examine into the soul of the young man as he lay in one corner of the small and noisome apartment, on a bed of straw that had been spread for a former inmate, we should find, perhaps, though surrounded by the greater danger—the danger of dying an ignominious death, having a blot left forever upon his memory, he was still serene and happy. And why was this? He had a companion in that dreary place, whose acquaintance had been sought in the hours of prosperity, and who now, in the darkness of trouble, would not depart; a companion that can cheer us amid the revilings of the world, can pierce through the bars of a dungeon and whisper to the desponding spirit, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

Charles Rivington was one of the too small number of young men who are not ashamed to be religious, "and verily he had a reward." The mere worldling similarly situated, would have been loud in imprecations, or dumb with agony; but, he upborne by conscious innocence, and knowing that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the will of our heavenly Father, humbled himself in prayer before that Being "who is mighty to save unto the uttermost;" and he arose from the exercise with those tranquilised and invigorated feelings, which are its invariable result.

Nearly two years had elapsed since our hero emigrated to that western region. He was the youngest, and at the time of our narrative, the only son of a widowed mother, who had been doomed to follow successively to the grave, a husband, a lovely daughter, her eldest born, and two fine and promising boys. Sick of the scene were death had made such havoc, and crushed so many fragrant buds of promise, she consented to accompany her sole remaining child to a place where the newness of the country seemed to hold forth greater prospects of success, than was afforded to a young practitioner among the overstocked population of a city. Hitherto their expectations had been amply realised. He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, provided for the Christian heart of that poor widow, a balm of sweetest efficacy. Her son was such a child as mothers pray for; he strove by redoubled filial attentions to supply the place of the lost ones to his parent; and her eyes seldom rested on his manly form, that they did not become watery, from the overfulness of gratified maternal love. Their family misfortunes had rendered his mind uncommonly docile; and it was the who planted there those seeds of righteousness, which, as we have seen, sprang up and produced goodly fruit.

On the afternoon of her son's commitment, she was sitting in the parlor of the pleasant little house which they occupied, when Judy, an Irish girl, who had lived long in the family, remaining with them through all their trouble, came running, almost breathless, into the apartment.

"Och, mistress, and the Lord bless you," she cried, as soon as she was able to speak, "and preserve your old heart of breaking—but I've got bad news for ye."

"How often, Judy, must I repeat to you," said the pious old lady, interrupting her, "that it is extremely wrong to use the name of your Maker so familiarly on all occasions; 'the Lord will not hold him guiltless who taketh his name in vain.'"

"Botheration, ma'am, but I've no time to tend to that now——"

"Judy!" interrupted Mrs. Rivington, again, "how can you speak so——"

"Ma'am, will you be pleased to hear me," roared out the servant, at length fully restored to her voice, "are you going to sit her preaching, and let them murder Mr. Charles?"

"Charles! gracious Providence!" ejaculated the mother, catching the alarm of the menial, "what is the matter—surely nothing evil has happened to him?"

"Oh, nothing at all, at all, mistress," responded Judy, striving to speak calmly, that she might not too suddenly shock the trembling parent; then, unable to control her feelings, she sobbed out, "my poor dear young master's in prison."

"In prison!" exclaimed the astonished mother, turning quickly to the weeping girl, and grasping her arm—"Judy," said she, with the earnestness of agonised apprehension, "tell me the whole truth—you have seen me bear calmly before—what does this mean?"

"Ah, madam just be quiet," returned the anxious servant; it's only one of them drunken hunters what's kilt himself, and the blackguards want to lay it to poor Mr. Charles, because he's a yankee as they call it, and that's jist the whole of it."

"My boy accused of murder! my honorable, my pious boy? Father of mercies!" said the pale and agitated mother, sinking on her knees, "if this withered heart is doomed to receive another wound, if my last earthly prop is torn from me, oh! do thou give me strength to bear this greatest of afflictions, and enable me to say, thy will, not mine be done." She rose with renewed composure, and turning to her maid, "get me my hat and shawl, Judy," said she, "I'm glad it's no worse; this is but a passing cloud; for he is innocent, and his innocence will soon be manifest. I feared lest he might be sick, or thrown from his horse; but the Lord be praised who hath not tried his servant beyond her strength."

Such was the language of the exemplary Mrs. Rivington, as she walked out that evening, with the intention of visiting her son in prison. We will not accompany her; their meeting was such as will be anticipated from their enlightened and pious characters: and though the good woman was alarmed by the strength of the circumstance adduced against her beloved boy, yet not for a moment was her faith in the justice of the Almighty so shaken, as to permit a fear that the guiltless would suffer. But leaving them mutually striving to strengthen and encourage each other, we will ask the reader to accompany us into the kitchen of Dr. Rivington's house, whither Judy immediately returned on the departure of her mistress.

"She's a noble hearted woman, that's what she is," said the girl, whose admiration was excited by the Christian firmness she had seen exhibited; "she's jist the right sort of a mither for such a swait young gentleman as he is; and you, Jimmy," (turning to Buckhorn, who sat with a sorrowing countenance in a corner) "ye're a pretty blackguard ar'nt ye, to give information 'ginst a man what you know niver did harm in his born days. Ah git along with ye—I'm fairly sick of ye!"

"But, Judy, when we found the rifle laying by the dead body," answered the distressed young man, "I very natur'ly said to Carlock, that that was the best trial we could have: for I know'd old Silversight had been down in the new settlement, and so, says I, the man what got this 'ere rifle from Drill's, must be the murderer; but if I'd a-know'd it was the Doctor took it out, miss fire but I'd a held my peace, if I never could shoot buck again till I told it. I hardly believe he killed the old fellow, now."

"Now 'pon my honor ye're a great fool," responded the indignant Judy; "you hardly believe it, do you? I tell you what, Jimmy Buckhorn, the man as comes a sparking to me, if I set ever so much by him, should niver get my consent, if he was the means of putting the dear young gentleman into limbo, till he contrived ways and means to get him clare again. You don't b'lieve he's guilty! Arrah now Jimmy, I've told you afore I's a sort of liking for you—but I'd sooner b'lieve you had murdered Mr. Charles as he did, if he was ever so provoked."

Buckhorn rose from his seat when the fluent and handsome Irish girl had finished her speech, and taking her hand, "Judy," said he, "my nag is tired down—but I'll get Rob Miller's—I'll go down and see the Doctor at the jail window, and find which way he went out to the head waters—then I'll follow up his trail from town, and see where he cut off to old Wentworth's, for it's sartin he slept there—and it may turn out that the villain's trail and his are two different ones. If so be that's the truth, I'll keep on the scent 'till I find out who the rail ruff'n is—and there's no time to be lost, for it may come up to snow, and that will fill up the track in short order. So, Judy, give me your hand, and there," continued he, kissing the blushing girl's lips, "there, I'll find out who the scamp is, or, in case that's impossible, if Doctor Rivington doesn't git clear, it shall be his own fault."

A heavy fall of snow did unfortunately occur that night, leaving the wide prairies as white and smooth as unwritten paper, and consequently depriving our calumniated hero of the most obvious, and apparently of every mode of substantiating his innocence. His confidence, however, in the Divine protection was undiminished; and nightly, from the silence of his cell, went up the inaudible aspirations of a soul that firmly relied on the goodness and justice of its prayer hearing Father. Nor did those pious orisons ascend unaccompanied through the still vault of night to the Almighty's ear: the aged mother's contrite heart was poured out in an agony of prayers; the parents of his affianced bride knelt often before the throne of Heaven for the welfare of their slandered boy, as in their affection they called him; and the blue eyes of Catharine wept supplications, and her pure and innocent heart, hitherto untouched by sorrow, except on the occasion of her sister's death, now continually sent unworded and unutterable appeals to her Creator, for her lover's life. In the meanwhile, week after week rolled by, and the day appointed for trial at length arrived.

CHAPTER IV.

The little village in which the sessions of the circuit were held, and which, for the sake of a name we will call Clarville, contained about fifty or sixty houses, most of them constructed of logs. There was an open space in the midst of it termed "the public square," in which stood a building answering the double purpose of court-house during sessions, and of meeting house when an occasional missionary passed through that part of the country. It fronted on the public road. The jail occupied a corner of the same place. It was a small, one-story edifice, about twelve feet square, and like the court-house, built of large hewn logs, fastened together with iron bolts at the corners. Its single apartment contained but one door and window, both secured by strong bolts and bars. A large brick house, the only one in the town, was situated on the rear of the square, and was occupied as a hotel, as the traveller was informed by a huge sign suspended from a post at the road-side, where was conspicuously written in great yellow letters, under a burlesque likeness of General Washington, "entertainment for man and horse." A little further up the road, or main street as it was called, though there was but one in the village, on the opposite side, was another tavern of more humble appearance than the first. It was around these two public places of entertainment, that a numerous assemblage of persons collected on the morning when the important trial was to take place, all eagerly conversing on the crime of which the prisoner was supposed to be guilty; and many of them uttering no very moderate anathemas against the yankees, whom they pretended to consider, en masse, as rogues and cheats, and who, at least, were coming into the country to break up their old manners and customs. The women, who were plentifully sprinkled among them, seemed very willing to join in the general clamor.

"They're a monstrous fidgety people, say the least of them," observed the large fat wife of a farmer, and her sleepy eyes and unmeaning face assumed something like angry vivacity as she spoke. "They want a heap of waitin' on; and you don't get no thanks after all. Now there was old Wentworth—he tarried with us, you know, Carlock, on account of his da'tar, when he first came out here. Good coffee wasn't good enough for 'em: they must have a little tea to be sure. So I sent Johnny down the Settlement to git some; and I took a heap of pains to cook the truck—and what do you think? they wouldn't eat a bit on't after all. I don't much wonder neither; for 'twas bitter, nasty trash, as ever I'd wish to taste. But it's always the way with 'em; they make trouble just for nothing."

The remarks of the indignant woman were fully concurred in by most of her simple and unsophisticated hearers; but there was one among them who was obliged to thrust his tongue into his cheek, and turn aside, to prevent the dame from seeing his laughter. He was the merchant's clerk, and had heard the story before. The fact was, that never having used the article of tea in her life, the poor woman had caused a pound of it to be purchased, and boiling it all in a large kettle, served it up to her guests as greens for dinner.

"They tell," said the farmer, who had the reputation of being a wit among his fellows, and whose linsey-woolsey coat contrasted strangely with a printed calico shirt, the collar of which was ostentatiously displayed. "They tell me that old Silversight had a power of money when he was killed. It's kill or cure with those yankee doctors, anyhow: but that was the queerest pill to give a patient I've ever heard of; and he took the trouble of your hands, Carlock, and paid the bill himself out of the dead man's pocket hey?"

Such is a specimen of the idle talk with which the crowd amused themselves, until the court, at length, assembled, when, after the usual preliminaries, the important trial commenced. The prisoner had been supplied by his anxious and affectionate parent with all the little comforts which the narrow apartment admitted of, except fire and candles; they being forbidden on account of the material of which the jail was constructed. But the coldness of the weather had been excessive, during a part of the time that he was the occupant of that dreary abode; and the boundaries of his cell not allowing of much exercise, a sickness fastened upon him, which though not dangerous in its nature, had rendered him thin and pale. He came into court, arm and arm with the attorney who was employed to plead his cause; and slightly bowing to those whose friendly salute indicated that they believed him innocent, he passed through the crowd, and took a seat beside the lawyer within the bar. From the high and exemplary character which he had sustained invariably, from his first settling in the place, until the present black suspicion rested on him, a degree of intuitive respect was accorded by all, that must have been highly gratifying to his feelings. A plea of not guilty was entered, and the examination of witnesses commenced.

George Carlock was the nephew of the deceased. On the night of the 16th of December, he was surprised to see the horse of his uncle arrive, with a saddle and bridle on, but without a rider. He thought that the deceased had stopped for a while, perhaps, at Buckhorn's, who lived a mile or so farther down the timber; but, as the night passed away without his returning home, he started early in the morning with the intention of trailing the horse. He called for Buckhorn, and they got upon the trail, and followed it till they found the dead body. Two young men that had joined them at Buckhorn's returned with the body, they continuing on the trail. It led them to Mr. Wentworth's. They inquired if any person had been there, that crossed over from the other side of the stream. They were answered that Dr. Rivington had crossed the stream, and remained the night with them. That Mr. Rumley, the deputy sheriff had also remained the night, but that he had come from further up on the same side. They followed on the trail, and found that there was a track from further up, most likely Mr. Rumley's. They continued on the track till they arrived in town. Being informed, by Mr. Drill, the gunsmith, that Dr. Rivington had taken Buckhorn's rifle with him, they immediately procured a warrant for his apprehension. They found him employed in counting the identical money which had been taken from the unfortunate Silversight.

James Buckhorn's testimony was in full corroboration of the preceding. He mentioned, in addition, that he examined the lock and barrel of his rifle, on finding it lying near the murdered man, and discovered that it had certainly been discharged, but a short time before.

The gunsmith deposed to his having given the rifle to the prisoner, on his offering to carry it out to Buckhorn, and that it had been discharged since.

"Mr. Drill," said Lawyer Blandley, who was counsel for our hero, "you mention having given the gun to Dr. Rivington; did you also give him a bullet that would fit the bore?"

"I did not."

"Did he exhibit any anxiety to obtain the weapon?" again asked the lawyer.

"By no means," replied the gunsmith; "I considered at the time that the Doctor's offer was one of mere kindness; and he had previously mentioned that he was going out that way to visit his parents."

"The bore of this rifle, Mr. Drill," continued the sagacious lawyer, "is very small. I presume that you are familiar with the size and qualities of all that are owned on the road out to Mr. Buckhorn's. Is there any house at which Dr. Rivington could have stopped and procured a ball of sufficient smallness?"

"John Gentry's rifle," answered Mr. Drill, "carries eighty-seven or eight to the pound, and one of his bullets with a thick patch, would suit Buckhorn's pretty well. That is the only one any where near the size."

The attorney for the people here asked the witness another question.

"For what purpose, sir, did the prisoner go into your shop, on the morning of the 16th December?"

"I was employed in repairing a pair of pocket pistols for him, and fitting a bullet mould to them. He came in, I believe, to inquire if they were finished."

"Please to note that answer, gentlemen of the jury," said the prosecuting attorney. "Mr. Drill you may stand aside."

Samuel Cochrane was next called. He was one of the young men who had returned with the body of Silversight. On his way back, and about two hundred yards from the place where the murder had been committed, he found a copper powder-flask, (which was shown to him, and he identified it,) the letters C. R. M. D. being cut upon one of its sides, apparently with a knife. There was but one more witness on the part of the people, Mr. Lawton, the magistrate before whom the unfortunate prisoner had been examined. He testified as to the facts which were deposed before him, together with the acknowledgment of Dr. Rivington that he had been in company with Mr. Silversight, &c. But we may pass over these circumstances, as the reader is already acquainted with them.

The prisoner was now put on his defence; and all that talent and ingenuity could devise, was done by his skilful counsel. The witnesses were cross-examined, and recross-examined; but their answers were uniformly the same. A large number of respectable persons came forward to testify to the excellence of our hero's general character, but their evidence was rendered unnecessary by the attorney for the people admitting in unequivocal terms, that previous to this horrid occurrence, it had been exemplary in a high degree. At length, wearied by his exertions, and distressed at their result, Mr. Blandley discontinued his examination: he had one more weapon to try in behalf of his client—the powerful one of eloquence; and it was used by a master of the art, but alas; was used in vain. He dwelt much on the fact that his unfortunate client had wished his route to be trailed from the village, and that Buckhorn had started for the purpose when the disastrous snow storm occurred, and took away the only hope he had of proving his innocence. He cited many cases to the jury in which circumstances, even stronger than these, had been falsified when their victim, murdered by their laws, was slumbering in his grave. He appealed to them as parents, to know if they would believe, that a son who had been so filial, whose character had previously been without stain or blemish, could suddenly turn aside from the path of rectitude and honor, to commit such an atrocious crime? But it would be useless to recapitulate the arguments that were made use of on this interesting occasion—they were ineffectual.

The attorney for the prosecution summed up very briefly. He assured the jury that the evidence was so clear in its nature, so concatinated, so incontrovertible, as to amount to moral certainty. Near the body of the murdered man, a powder flask, such as the eastern people principally use, had been found, with the initials of the prisoner's name and medical degree engraven upon it—C. R. M. D.—Charles Rivington, Doctor of Medicine. The trail is pursued, and it leads them to the house of Mr. Wentworth, where the prisoner arrived on the evening of the bloody deed, and remained all night. They continue on the trail, till at last they find him with greedy eyes, bending over the plunder that he had torn from his grey-haired victim. "Such," he concluded, "is a rapid outline of the facts; and deeply as I deplore the young man's guilt, yet believing him guilty, it is my sacred duty to display his enormity—but further than the imperious call of justice requires, I will not—I cannot go."

The charge of the judge, who was evidently very much affected, occupied but a few minutes: and the jury retired to make up their verdict. I have already told the reader that the prisoner was pale, in consequence of sickness, produced by his exposed situation in prison; but the appalling events of the trial had caused no alteration in his appearance. He sat firm and collected; and there was a melancholy sweetness in the expression of his countenance, which told that all was calm within. Indeed, the awful coincidence of the circumstances had been made fully known to him, before he came into court; he was convinced unless the interposing arm of heaven should prevent the blow, that death and ignominy must fall upon him, and, after a severe internal conflict he had become enabled to say, "Thy will be done."

His mother, by the assistance of that never failing comfort in sorrow, religion, had hitherto supported, with something like resignation to the divine will, this greatest earthly calamity. In compliance with the earnest request of her son, who was fearful that the feelings of nature might become too strong for control, and who wished to behave with manliness and equanimity through the trying period, she refrained from going to court, on the day that was, to decide, in a great measure, her mortal destiny.

Seated in the little parlor of their dwelling together with the weeping Catharine, the strength of whose love had drawn her to the spot, and awaiting with intense anxiety the issue of the laggard hour, was the mother of Charles Rivington, at the time which I have brought my narrative. She started at each noise that reached her ear, and every breeze that shook the casement seemed laden with the awful sentence of the law against her son. And yet that noble woman, though torn by the deep and awful solicitude which only a mother's heart can know, strove to speak the words of comfort to the lovely being beside her, whose affectionate bosom seemed bursting with affection.

"Weep not so bitterly," she said, "Catharine, my dear child; alas! I soon may have no other child than you. But no: the Searcher of hearts knows that Charles is guiltless, and will yet put forth his arm to save. What sound was that!—I am wrong to distrust his goodness: yet this is a heavy, heavy hour. I have knelt, Catharine, at the bedside of three lovely children, three little human blossoms, that death untimely cropped, and was enabled to bow with resignation to the inscrutable decree. But this, oh my Father," groaned the tortured parent, "suffer this bitterest cup to pass from me. Catharine, dry your tears: He whose powerful hand led forth unharmed from the fiery furnace, the three that would not renounce his name, will yet deliver my boy from the toils that are around us."

At this moment Judy was seen from the window running rapidly toward the house and directly after, pale and breathless, entered the apartment.

"Judy!" faintly cried the agonised parent trembling in every nerve, but unable to utter more.

"An', madam," responded the servant, "I know what you'd be asking me—tak' comfort, it's no decided yit; the juries has jist gone up stairs, to talk it over among themselves: and bless their swait souls, they cried a'most as I did mysel' when Mr. Blandley spoke to 'em. Ah, he's a nice gentleman, and he knows exactly what kind o' body, Mister Charles is. He described him jist for all the world as I would, only I couldn't use such words."

"The jury wept—there is hope, then, Judy?" inquired the parent in a faultering voice.

"Wept did they? yes, and the judge, and Mr. Wentworth could scarce give his evidence for crying—and they all cried, except Mr. Charles himself. He looked pale and sorrowful, but there was no blubbering about him. I niver see'd him look so ilegant afore. But I jist rin here to till ye how things was going on: I'll go back, and find what them juries says. I hope they may niver be able to open their ugly mouths, till it's jist to spake the word "innocent."

"Stop, Judy," said Mrs. Rivington, feeling unable to endure the horrors of another period of suspense. "I will go with you; I trust that heaven will give me strength to bear the issue, even should it be the worst that can befall!"

"Ye had better not, my dear mistress," replied the devoted servant; "for there are hard-hearted people about the place that b'lieve he's guilty, because he's a Yankee—oddsrot their saucy tongues—and they mout jeer at ye, because ye're his mother."

"They cannot—at any rate, I will go forth," said the afflicted woman, "he's my own, true, pious, noble-hearted boy; and his mother will be by to whisper consolation in his ear, though every tongue were loud in mockery and reviling."

"And I will go with you, mother," said Catharine, rising from her chair, and drying her tears, "I know he is innocent—and should the worst come, it is better to bear it at once, than linger here in such protracted anguish."

The assembled crowd was still anxiously awaiting the return of the verdict, when the mother of Charles Rivington, leaning on the arm of Catharine Wentworth, entered the court house of Clairville. A passage was instantly opened for them, with that intuitive respect which almost all men are ready to yield to misfortune, even when accompanied by guilt. They had not been long seated, in a part of the room where they could be most screened from observation, when the jury returned, and handing a sealed verdict to the clerk, resumed their places. The clerk rose, and read in a faltering voice, "we find the prisoner, Charles Rivington, guilty." The words had scarcely left his lips, when a piercing shriek ran through the apartment, and Catharine Wentworth fell lifeless to the floor. Not so with that Christian mother—with unwonted strength she darted through the assembly, until she reached her child: "my boy!" she cried, "Be of good cheer. Your heavenly Father knows your inmost soul, and sees that you are guiltless. We shall lie down together—for think not I can survive you—we shall lie down together to awake with the Lord—my boy—my boy! little did I think to see this bitter day"—exhausted nature could endure no more, and the mother fainted in the arms of her child.

I shall not attempt to describe the situation of my unhappy hero, for words are inadequate to the task. The insensible forms of his mother and beloved Catharine were conveyed from the scene: and when some degree of silence was restored among the sympathising multitude, the judge proceeded to pronounce sentence upon him. He had nothing to say to avert it, except a reiterated declaration of his innocence, and he besought the court, that the time previous to his execution might be made as brief as possible, in mercy to his bereaved parent, who would be but dying a continual death, while he survived. It was according fixed to take place on that day three weeks.

CHAPTER V.

It was near midnight of that important day—the busy throng which the trial had collected together were dispersed, and the moon, high in heaven, was waning on her silent course, through the clouds of a wintry sky, when Charles Rivington, startled from unquiet slumber, by a fancied noise at the door of his prison, and sitting up in his bed that he might more intently listen, heard his own name whispered from the outer side.

"Will you wake Mr. Charles!" was softly uttered in the sweet accent of our little Irish acquaintance, Judy. "Was there ever the like!" said she, "and he a sleeping at that rate, when his friends are opening the door for him."

"Be quiet, Judy," responded a masculine voice, but modulated to its softest tone, "and stand more in the shadow. The Doctor 'll wake fast enough, as soon as I git this bolt sawed out; but if ye gin that tavern keeper's dog a barking, there's no telling but it may wake the jailor, instead of the Doctor."

"And you're right Jimmy, dear," responded Judy, "there now, let go with your fingers, man: you can't pull it off that'ere way. Here, tak' this bit of a stake for the pry—and now, that's your sort, continued she, adding her strength to his, and a large end of the log to which the fastenings of the door were appended, fell to the ground. "Now, one more pull Jimmy, and the day's our own."

They accordingly made another exertion of united strength, when the prison door flying open Buckhorn and Judy stood before our prisoner.

"There, Mr. Charles, say nothing at all, at all, about it, but jist take Jimmy's nag, that's in the hollow, and get clare as well as you can.—There's a steamboat, Jimmy says, at St. Louis, going right down the river, and here's all the money that we could git, but it's enough to pay your passage any how," said the affectionate girl, tears standing in her eyes, as she reached to her respected, and, as she firmly believed, guiltless master, all her own hoardings, together with the sum which Buckhorn had been accumulating, ever since he became a suitor for her hand.

"You are a kind and excellent girl," answered Rivington, sensibly affected by the heroism and attachment of his domestic, "and you are a noble fellow, Buckhorn; but, you forget, that by flying I should only confirm those in the belief of my guilt, who are wavering now; besides, I could hardly expect to escape; for my life being forfeit to the law, a proclamation would be immediately issued, and apprehension and death, then, as now, would be my doom. No, no, my good friends; you mean me well but I cannot consent to live, unless I can live with an unsullied name."

"Ah, dear doctor," sobbed out poor Judy, whose heart seemed almost breaking, "what's the use of speaking about it? If you stay, you're but a few days to live, and if you tak' your chance now, who knows but the rail murderer may be found out, and then you might come back, Mr. Charles, and all would go well again."

"That is a powerful argument, Judy; but my trust is in Him who beholds all our actions," returned our hero, "and I must confess that I cannot divest myself of the hope, that the truth will yet be brought to light, before I die the death of a felon."

"Doctor Rivington," said Buckhorn, going up to him and taking him warmly by the hand, "I've been wavering all along about you; but I'm sartain now. The man that murdered Silversight in cold blood, would'nt be a going to stand shilly-shally, and the jail door wide open. I always was dub'ous about it, though the proof seemed so sure. My nag is down in the hollow, with saddle-bags on him, and Judy filled 'em full of your clothes; you may take him, Doctor, if ye will; you may take the money in welcome—but I, that come here to get you cl'ar, advise you to stay; and if I don't find out somethin' to turn the tables before hanging day it sha'nt be because I don't try."

Our hero exchanged with the honest hunter one of those warm pressures of the hand which may be termed the language of the soul, and conveyed to him by the eloquent action, more than he could readily have found words to express. They were now alarmed by the report of two rifles near them, fired in quick succession, and two persons issuing from the shadow of a neighboring horse shed at the same moment, made directly toward the door of the jail, crying out in a loud voice, "the prisoner has broke out! the prisoner has broke out!" Our friends, Judy and Buckhorn, were enabled to make good their retreat, as the object of alarm seemed more to secure the prisoner, than the arrest of his intended deliverers. It was not many minutes before a considerable number of the idle and the curious were collected by this clamor around the insufficient place of confinement, and effectual means were devised to prevent any danger of a further attempt at rescue.

The glimmer of hope which had been lightened up in our hero's heart by the last words of Buckhorn, and the confident manner in which they were uttered, gradually declined, as day after day rolled by, and no traces could be discovered of the real perpetrator of the crime. To add to the anguish of his situation, he learned that his beloved Catharine was confined by a wasting fever, to her bed; and that his mother, though she still bore up, and uttered not a murmur against the Almighty's will, was fast sinking of a broken heart into the grave. The evening previous to the fatal day which was to terminate his earthly career, at length arrived, but, brought no cheering promise with it; and the unhappy young man, therefore humbling himself before the throne of heaven, and beseeching that mercy there, which he could no longer hope for on earth, devoted a greater part of the night to prayer.

It was on the same evening, in a little mean looking cabin, called "Brown's tavern," in the place which we have before had occasion to speak of as the New Settlement, that two persons were sitting at a table with a bottle of whiskey between them, conversing on the general topic, the execution that was to take place on the morrow, when a third one entered, and calling for a dram, took a seat some distance from them. He was a tall, dark man, dressed in a hunting frock, and buckskin leggings; and held in his hand one of these mongrel weapons, which, partaking of the character both of rifle and musket, are called smooth bores by the hunters of our western frontier, who, generally speaking, hold them in great contempt. The apartment of the little grocery, or tavern, where these three persons were assembled, was lighted, in addition to the blaze of a large wood fire, by a single long-dipped tallow candle, held in an iron candlestick; and its only furniture consisted of the aforementioned table, with the rude benches on which the guests were seated. The conversation had been interrupted by the entry of the third person, but it was now resumed.

"For my part, as I was saying," observed one of the persons, in continuation of some remark he had previously made, "I think the thing's been too hasty. The Doctor's character, which every body respected, should have made 'em more cautious how they acted; especially as he wanted 'em to go right out on his trail, and said they'd find he had kept straight on to Mr. Wentworth's. Now he would'nt a-told 'em that, if it was'nt so; and I'm half a mind to b'lieve that he's not guilty, after all that's been proved again him."

"That's damned unlike," said the stranger, in a gruff voice.

"Why bless me, Mr. Rumley," continued the first speaker, "I didn't know it was you, you sat so in the dark. How have you been this long time? Let me see—why, yes, bless me, so it was—it was you and me that was talking with poor old Silversight the day he started from here with the money. I hav'nt seen you since. Why, ain't you a going to be over in Clairsville, to see the Doctor hung to-morrow?"

"I don't know whether I shall go or not," replied Rumley.

"Well, I have a great notion to ride over there, though I'm monstrous sorry for the poor man."

"Sorry, the devil!—hang all the cursed Yankees I say!" responded the amiable deputy sheriff.

"Come, that's too bad—though I like to see you angry on account of the old man's murder, because ye wasn't very good friends with him when he was alive—but bless me, Mr. Rumley, that powder-horn looks mighty like old Silversight's," taking hold of it to examine it, as he said so.

"Stand off!" cried Rumley; "what do you s'pose I'd be doing with the old scoundrel's powder-horn. It's not his—it never was his—he never seen it."

"It's a lie!" cried a person who had glided in during the foregoing conversation, and had obtained a view of the horn in question, as the deputy sheriff jerked it away from the sight of the other: "it's a lie! I know it well—I've hunted with the old man often, and I know it as well as I do my own. Bill Brown and you, John Gillam," addressing himself to the one who first recognised the powder-horn, "I accuse Cale Rumley of old Silversight's murder—help me to secure him."

The deputy sheriff stood motionless for a moment, and turned as pale as death, (from surprise perhaps) then, suddenly recovering his powers, he darted across the room, and seizing his gun, before any one was aware of his intention, levelled and fired at his accuser. The apartment became instantly filled with smoke, which, as it slowly rolled away, discovered to the astonished beholders, the stiff and bleeding corpse of Caleb Rumley stretched at full length upon the floor. As soon as he discharged his piece, the infuriated man had sprung toward the door, designing to make an immediate escape, but the motion was anticipated by our friend Jimmy Buckhorn, (for it was he who charged his fallen antagonist with murder, and who luckily was not touched by the ball that was meant to destroy him, and with one blow of his powerful arm, he felled the scoundrel to the earth. He now rapidly explained to the wondering trio, the nature of the proof he had obtained of Rumley's guilt; and succeeded in satisfying them that he ought to be made prisoner, and immediately conveyed to Edgarton.

CHAPTER VI.

The morning which our hero believed was to be the last of his earthly existence, arose with unwonted brightness; and throngs of males and females came pouring into the little village, impelled by the mysterious principle of our natures which incites us to look on that which we nevertheless must shudder to behold. But no sounds of obstreperous merriment, no untimely jokes, were uttered as they passed along the road to grate upon the ears of the unfortunate Charles, and break him off from his communion with heaven: on the contrary many a tear was shed that morning, by the bright eyes of the rustic maidens, who were "all unused to the melting mood;" and many a manly breast heaved a sigh of sympathy for the culprit, who was that day to make expiation to the offended laws. Indeed, since the sentence of the court was passed a wonderful change had been wrought among the ever changing multitude, by various rumors that were whispered from one part of the wide prairies to another, and spread with almost incredible velocity. A thousand acts of unasked for benevolence were now remembered, in favor of him who was so soon to suffer. Here was an aged and afflicted woman he had not only visited without hope of reward, but upon whom he had conferred pecuniary, as well as medicinal comforts. There was an industrious cripple, who had received a receipt in full from the young physician, when creditors to a less amount were levying on his farm. And many similar acts of bounty were proclaimed abroad, by the grateful hearts on which they had been conferred, all helping to produce the change of sentiment which was manifestly wrought. Still the general impression seemed to be unshaken, (so strong had been the proofs) that in an evil hour, he had yielded to temptation, and imbrued his hands in a fellow creature's blood.

The hour at last arrived when Charles Rivington was to suffer the sentence of the law. A rude gallows was erected at about a quarter of a mile from the public square, and thither the sad procession moved. He was decently dressed in a black suit, and walked to the fatal place with a firm step. He was very pale; but from no other outward sign might the spectators guess that he shrunk from the horrors of such a death—for his eye had a calm expression, and the muscles of his face were as motionless as an infant's in slumber. They reached the spot. A prayer, a solemn prayer was offered up to heaven for the murderer's soul, in which every hearer joined with unaccustomed fervor. The sheriff's attendant stood in waiting with the fatal cord, while the agonised mother vainly endeavoring to emulate the firmness of her heroic boy approached with trembling steps to bid a last farewell, when, hark! a shout was heard—all eyes were turned to catch its meaning—another shout, and the words, "stop! stop the execution!" were distinctly audible. In less than an instant after, the death-pale form of Jimmy Buckhorn tumbled from his horse, with just sufficient strength remaining to reach toward the sheriff an order from the judge to stay the execution.

Reader, our tale is nearly at an end. Jimmy Buckhorn had been faithful to his word. He had sought for some clue to the real murderer, with an earnestness which nothing but a firm conviction of our hero's innocence, superadded to his love for Judy, could possibly have enkindled. For some time he was unsuccessful. At length the thought struck him that the track on the side of the stream where Mr. Wentworth resided, might have been caused by a traveller passing along, on the morning after the fatal deed, and the deputy sheriff, in that case might be the real culprit. He immediately set out to visit every cabin above Mr. Wentworth's, to see if the story that he had been further up the stream, was correct. This took considerable time; but the result satisfied him that the tale was false. He then procured the assistance of a surgeon, imposing upon him secrecy, until the proper time for disclosure, and proceeded to disinter the body of Silversight. This was more successful than he had even dared to hope; the ball had lodged in a cavity of the head, and being produced, Buckhorn pronounced at once, from its size, that it could have been discharged only from Rumley's smoothbore. He set out directly for Edgarton, choosing to go by the way of the New Settlement, for a two-fold reason. He had heard that Rumley was in that neighborhood and to get possession of him, or of his gun at any rate, he deemed very essential. Besides, that route would take him by the house of the judge, and from him it would be necessary to procure an order to delay the proceedings. We have seen the result. But the chain of evidence was not yet complete.

A wild and dissipated young man, by the name of Michael Davis, who had just returned up the river from New Orleans, entered the office of the clerk of the county, on his way back to the tavern, from the place where the execution was to have taken place, in order to while away an hour until the time for dinner should arrive. The powder-flask, which had been brought in evidence against our hero, was lying on the table, the graven side downward. There is a restless kind of persons in the world, who can never be easy, let them be sitting where they will, without fingering and examining whatever is within their reach—and such a one was Michael Davis; he accordingly took up the flask in a careless manner, and turning it over in his hand, his eyes fell upon the letters.

"Why, halloo, what the devil are you doing with my powder-flask?" asked he.

"I wish the unlucky article had been yours, or anybody's except the unfortunate Dr. Rivington's," returned the clerk, who was a friend of our hero, and deeply deplored the circumstances that had lately transpired.

"Unfortunate devil's!" reiterated Michael; "I tell you it's my flask, or article, as you prefer calling it; or rather it was mine and Cale Rumley's together. We bought it when him and me went down to Orleans—let's see, that's three years, come Spring. I ought to know the cursed thing, for I broke a bran new knife in scratching them letters on it."

The clerk started from his seat—he snatched the flask out of the hands of Davis—he gazed at it a moment intently—then the truth suddenly flashing across his mind, he rushed out into the road, forgetting his hat—forgetting everything but the letters on the flask. The magistrate, who grieved as much as any one, at the supposed dereliction of their young friend, the physician, was amazed to see the clerk enter his apartment in such a plight.

"There!" cried he, as he threw down the flask on the table, "C. R. M. D. spells something beside Rivington. Send your servant out of the room." As soon as he was gone and the door carefully closed, the clerk continued in a low confidential tone, "that flask is Caleb Rumley's, and Caleb Rumley is the murderer, (no wonder he has kept away all this while!) It belonged to him and that imp of Satan, Michael Davis together; and Mike Davis told me so, with his own mouth, not three minutes ago—and Charles Rivington's an honest man—huzza! huzza! huzza!" concluded he, as he skipped about the apartment, with the delirious joy true friendship inspired. The magistrate was a man of middle age, and very large and corpulent; but a mountain of flesh could not have kept him down, when such thrilling news tingled in his ears, and he too began to dance a jig, that shook the tenement to its foundation.

It became the duty of the worthy magistrate to commit, in the course of that very day, our respected friend, Caleb Rumly, Esq. deputy sheriff of the country of ——— ———, to the same capacious tenement which Doctor Rivington had lately inhabited; he, with the consent of the Judge, being more safely disposed of in the prison of — his own house. A bill was immediately found by the grand jury, and the trial of the real murderer came on shortly after. For a long time he absolutely denied any knowledge of the death of Silversight; but as proofs after proofs were disclosed against him, first became doggedly silent, then greatly intimidated, and at last made a full disclosure of his crime. He was found guilty, and executed on the same gallows that had been erected for our calumniated hero.

The sickness of Catharine Wentworth was long and severe; but our friend Charles was her physician, and the reader will not wonder that it yielded at last to his skill. The Christian parent of our hero had been condemned, at different periods of her life, to drink deeply of the cup of affliction, and she had bowed with a noble humility to the decree of heaven: it was thence she now derived support in this most trying hour of joy. Spring had gone forth, warbling with her thousand voices of delight over those wide extended prairies, and the flowers had sprung into a beautiful existence at her call, when the hand of the blushing Catharine, herself a lovely flower, was bestowed in marriage on the transported Charles Rivington. Never did there stand before the holy man a happier, a more affectionate pair. Their hearts had been tried—severely tried; they had been weighed in the balance and not found wanting. The house of Mr. Wentworth was the scene of their union; and on the same evening, and by the hand that bound her "dear Mister Charles," to his blooming bride, our little Irish Judy was united to the worthy Buckhorn, who had been prevailed upon, reluctantly, to lay aside his hunting shirt and leather leggings on the joyful occasion. The evening glided rapidly away, urged along by tales of mirth, and song, and jest, and it was observed that though Charles and Catharine took but little share in the rattling conversation of the hour, they appeared to enjoy the scene with happiness that admitted of no increase. Indeed, often did the tender blue eyes of the beautiful bride become suffused with crystal drops of joy, as she raised them up in thankfulness to her Heavenly Father, who had conducted them safely through all the perils of the past, and at last brought them together under the shelter of his love.

"The whole trouble came out of your being so kind, Doctor Rivington," said the manly, though, in his new suit, rather awkward-looking Buckhorn. "It was all of your kindness in offering to bring out my plaguy rifle. If it hadn't been for that, suspicion wouldn't alighted on you at all."

"Now, hold your tongue, Jimmy, dear," answered his loquacious little wife; "I thought so myself, till Mister Charles explained it to me, and then I found out how 'twas the wisdom of the Almighty put it into his head to carry your gun; for how would you ever get on the true scent, if the big bullet hadn't tould ye for sartin that it was niver the small-bored rifle what kilt him. No, blessed be His name, that made thee, as he always will, goodness its own reward, and put it in the heart of my dear kind master, to carry out a great clumsy gun to an old ranger like you, Buckhorn. And, under heaven, the cause of all our present happiness, take my word for it, is THE RIFLE."

READING SHAKSPEARE.

BY T. MILLER.

Far in the wood's sad, solitary gloom
Two maidens sat, beneath an aged tree,
In leafy summer's sweet expanding bloom;
A brook rolled by in mournful minstrelsy,
Bordered with sweetest flowers and mosses curled,
There they communed with him whose fame yet fills the world.

And as the stream stole murmuringly along,
Their kindred fancies with its music rose;
And their ears caught Ophelia's dying song
Down the deep waters, sinking to a close;
A pensive willow, drooping from the land,
Lower stooped to bend, grasped by her pale, thin hand.

And huge fantastic trunks, knarled, old and grey,
Assumed the heath-hag forms in that dim scene;
The blending boughs, the while, shut out the day,
And formed a cave, where lips of livid green—
Such seemed the leaves—were muttering mystic saws,
The pebbling brook, too, mocked the cauldron's bubbling groans.

And fairy visions floated gently by—
A merry train, that haunted greenwood dells,
Or as they willed it, swept through earth and sky,
Or made their homes within the wild flower bells;
Or down the silvery star-beams loved to glide;
Or on the moonlit waves in bliss ride.

And giant shadows passed in long array—
The mighty phantoms of a thousand years;
Spirits that filled the globe with sore dismay,
And deluged cities deep in blood and tears;
Egypt and Troy, and scenes of early ages
That will outlive all time, in his immortal pages.

Battles and banners swept before their eyes,
And many a sceptered king and stately queen;
Sorrow, and care, and tears, and heavy sighs
Beneath the imperial purple robes were seen;
And lovely nymphs, in gems and roses crowned,
To dulcet music moved, in many a mazy round.

And mask and revel glided through the wood,
And slow processions stole along the glades,
And the tall flowers that bent across the flood
Were changed to waving plumes and gleaming blades;
And shout, and drum, and trumpet's fearful clang,
Rent the still air, and through the echoing forest rang.

Shakspeare unlocked men's heart, laid bare a world—
Distilled its crimes and beauties, and then flew
To his own mighty mind, and from it hurled,
A new creation: forms that never grew
Beneath a mother's eye, before him moved,
And, as he chose, they lived, and wept, and laughed, and loved.

NOVEMBER.

November, with its loss of verdure, its frequent rains, the fall of the leaf, and the visible approach of winter, is, undoubtedly, a gloomy month to the gloomy; but to others, it brings but pensiveness, a feeling very far from destitute of pleasure; and if the healthiest and most imaginative of us may feel their spirits pulled down by reflections connected with earth, its mortalities, and its mistakes, we should but strengthen ourselves the more to make strong and sweet music with the changeful but harmonious movements of nature. In no system is there really any such thing as death: all is but change and vitality. We become either spiritual essences or new physical beings, or rather both; and, with November's leave, if Pythagoras did not shrink from the idea of being a bird, we do not see why Tomkins should be so fastidious. There are but two things that are really horrible—malignity and superstition: one, which disturbs the present world; and the other, which, beside disturbing the present, makes a Pandæmonium of the greater part of the future. All other painful things are but follies; and indeed these are but of all follies the most painful.

There are many pleasures in November, if we will lift up our matter-of-fact eyes, and find that there are matters-of-fact we seldom dream of. It is a pleasant thing to meet the gentle fine days that come to contradict our sayings of us. It is a pleasant thing to see the primrose come back again in woods and meadows. It is a pleasant thing to catch the whistle of the green-flower, and to see the green-finches congregate. It is a pleasant thing to listen to the deep, amorous note of the wood-pigeons, who now come back again; and it is a pleasant thing to hear the deeper voice of the stags, making their triumphant love amidst the falling leaves.

Beside a quantity of fruit, our gardens retain a number of the flowers of last month, with the striped lily in leaf; and in addition to several of the flowering trees and shrubs, we have the fertile and glowing China-roses in flower; and in fruit, the pyracantha, with its lustrous red berries, that cluster so beautifully on the walls of cottages. This is the time, also, for domestic cultivators of flowers to be very busy in preparing for those spring and winter ornaments, which used to be thought the work of magic. They may plant hyacinths, dwarf-tulips, polyanthus-narcissus, or any other moderate-growing bulbous roots, either in water-glasses or in pots of light dry earth, to flower early in their apartments. If in glasses, the bulb should be a little in the water; if in pots, a little in the earth, or but just covered. They should be kept in a warm, light room.

The trees generally lose their leaves in the following succession: walnut, mulberry, horse-chestnut, sycamore, lime, ash; then, after an interval, elm; then beech and oak; then apple and peach trees, sometimes not till the end of November; and lastly pollard-oaks and young beeches, which retain their withered leaves until pushed off by their new ones in spring. Oaks that happen to be stripped of their leaves by chaffers will often surprise the haunter of nature by being clothed again soon after mid-summer with a beautiful vivid foliage.

The farmer endeavors to finish his ploughing this month, and then lays up his instruments for the spring. Cattle are kept in the yard or stable, sheep turned into the turnip-field, or in bad weather fed with hay; bees moved under shelter, and pigeons fed in the dove-house.

Among autumnal pleasures, we ought not to have omitted the very falling of the leaves:

"To view the leaves, thin dancers upon air,
Go eddying round."

Toward the end of the month, under the groves and other shady places, they begin to lie in heaps and to rustle to the foot of the passenger; and there they will lie till the young leaves are grown overhead, and spring comes to look down upon them with her flowers:

"Oh Spring! of hope, and love, and youth and gladness
Wind-winged emblem! brightest, best, and fairest!
Whence comest thou, when, with dark winter's sadness,
The tears that fade in sunny smiles thou sharest?
Sister of joy, thou art the child who wearest
Thy mother's dying smile, tender and sweet;
Thy mother Autumn, for whose grave thou bearest
Fresh flowers, and beams like flowers, with gentle feet,
Disturbing not the leaves which are her winding-sheet."

THE SILK CULTURIST.

From the Journal of the American Silk Society.

KEEPING OF MULTICAULIS OVER WINTER.

As great numbers of multicaulis trees will be taken up this fall and kept out of the ground all winter, for purposes of sale, and by many, under an apprehension that they will be injured by the inclemencies of the season, it is deemed proper to devote a portion of the present number, to the best mode of preserving them. Let us be understood, however; if the trees are growing on high dry situations, (the more stony and gravelly the better,) and the trees are not wanted for any purpose till the opening of spring, the best and most certain method of preserving them, is to leave them where they are. In such situations we have never known a tree, or a limb, or even a bud, to be injured by winter. This is our own practice invariably. We never even take off the cuttings we intend to plant in the spring till we have got the ground ready for them, in March or April. But where early frosts, and late spells of warm weather between them, late planting, &c. have caused a considerable quantity of unripened wood at the extremities to remain at the fall of the leaf, all this unripened wood should be cut off before the severe cold approaches—say immediately after the leaves have fallen,—and buried in the ground as follows; select the highest and driest situation in the field or garden, if possible on the north side of a house, barn, or high board fence, (but not under trees,) where the sun never shines in winter. Lay the cuttings on the top of the ground, side by side, near together, but not touching; cover the first layer with loose fine earth one inch. Then lay on another layer of cuttings, side by side, as before, and then another layer of earth, and so on till you have laid all the cuttings down, taking care to press the earth firmly. Then throw on earth, covering the whole about one foot deep, and packing the surface firmly, and forming the top of the pile into the shape of the roof of a house that it may throw off the water. If you have one thousand branches you wish to preserve, lay down one hundred in each layer, and then you will have ten layers. The earth which you use should be taken from a ditch, which you will dig around the pile, and this ditch will serve as a drain to draw off the water from the pile of cuttings. Care must be taken that no interstices be left among the cuttings, as the confined air in them will cause mildew, and of course the loss of the cuttings. The situation should be protected from the sun as much as possible, that the pile may remain frozen all winter, as it is the occasional freezing and thawing that injures unripened wood. It should not be exposed to the dripping from the eaves of the house, or from trees, as that saturates the pile with water. This unripened wood, thus preserved, if taken from the pile in the spring and immediately planted without unnecessary exposure to the air, will grow and make as fine trees as the best matured wood.

Where trees must necessarily be taken up and kept out of the ground during the winter, the best mode of preserving them is to bury their roots in the ground in an erect position, in some situation perfectly protected from the sun. Where a large number are to be protected, a long shed that will shelter them from the sun, should be erected, open at the sides and ends, that a free passage may be afforded for the air. The situation should be the highest and driest at command, and the more open to a northern exposure the better.

Once for all, let it be said, that the morus multicaulis is never injured by cold, however intense it may be; that they are only injured in winter by the sudden application of heat while in a frozen state; and that the only protection they require during winter, is to be protected from HEAT, at all times.

Supposing that a shed, as above mentioned, has been erected for the purpose, the trees may be set as close as possible, merely throwing a little earth between the roots, and when all are set, the trees left standing as if they had grown there. If any part of the roots appear above ground they should be covered by the application of a shovel full of earth. If the soil be of a sandy quality, it is the best. Clay soil should be avoided, as it cannot be placed about the roots without leaving cavities, which will cause mildew.

Cellars, open at the north and south sides, will answer a good purpose, provided they are on high situations; but if at the foot of hills, they will not do, unless on the north side of the hill, as they are apt to be too damp, and thus in warm spells of weather, to engender mildew.

The next best plan for the preservation of trees, is that laid down for the preservation of unripe wood, at the beginning of this paper.—It is a very laborious plan where a large number of trees are to be preserved, but it is worthy of all the labor required in the present state of things—where the tree is so valuable.

When trees have been preserved by burying, as in the case of unripe wood, they are in so delicate a condition in the spring as to be incapable of bearing much exposure to the dry atmosphere without injury, and, therefore, should be planted as soon as possible after being taken out of the pile.

When trees are preserved in close cellars, in sand, they are apt to become mildewed, and of course killed. If they are entirely buried in sand in a close cellar, they are often preserved in perfect condition, but are liable to grow, from the warmth of the cellar, and thus become injured. In such cases the only remedy is to ventilate the cellar by opening windows on the north and south sides, and keeping ice in the cellar, and thus cooling it. Take it for granted, that you cannot hurt the trees by cold in any situation where the sun cannot shine on them.

Be careful of the roots of the trees, when taken up from the ground where they grow, the roots should not be exposed to the sun, nor to frost in the open air. For if the root be injured by drying or frost, the whole tree may be lost. The root is the most delicate part of the tree, and when that is injured, the whole tree is almost certain to be lost. If the root be frozen, and suddenly exposed to the sun, the tree is inevitably destroyed. We have seen trees that presented a fine healthy appearance, they looked plump, the buds sound: but on examining the roots we found them shrivelled, or mildewed, in spots, the bark rotten and easily removed. These would generally be taken for good trees for cuttings, and we have seen many such sold for propagation. But on cutting up these trees into cuttings there will appear a dark colored ring around the wood under the bark, showing that decay has commenced. The buds of the cuttings will generally grow an inch or two, but then, not capable of making roots, they wither and die. We have seen millions of cuttings fail from this cause, and in this way the past season, the cause of the injury was, probably the freezing of the roots and their exposure to sun or air while so frozen, or the roots may have become shrivelled and dry from exposure, and thus lost their vital circulation.

The multicaulis may be kept in perfect condition from the fall of the leaf in the fall, till late planting time in the spring; may be transported from country to country, and passed from hand to hand, with proper care. From the time it ceases growing in the fall, till the proper season for its commencing growth again in the spring, it may with proper attention be used as an article of merchandise with perfect safety. But it cannot "stand every thing." The roots must never be allowed to become dry, nor will it do to keep them moist by the application of water. They must be able to take up from the surrounding medium, whether that be earth, moss, or sand, that peculiar moisture, (or water in an extremely minute division of its particles,) adapted to the extremely small absorbent vessels of its roots. You will drown a tree by a long continued immersion into water, as well as an animal; whereas, if the roots had been surrounded by moist earth, or moss, it could have imbibed a sufficient degree of moisture to preserve it.—Keep the roots from becoming dry by exposure to the air, light, or sunshine, and you may rely upon the trees being preserved.

PURCHASERS OF TREES are cautioned against receiving, either in the fall, winter, or spring, any tree as sound, the bark of which has become shrivelled. It is as much a sign of death in vegetation, as is the recession of blood from the surface of animals a sign of death in them. It is true that the multicaulis is so tenacious of life that we can sometimes resuscitate a tree after the bark has become shrivelled and dry; but it is difficult, and not often accomplished. At all events purchasers should never receive trees in that condition. We attribute most of the failures of cuttings the past season, to the bad condition of the cuttings planted. We saw many trees sold, and planted too, the bark of which had become perfectly shrivelled and dry, and were greatly surprised at the delusion of both seller and buyer. Let purchasers also examine the roots of the trees they purchase. If they are shrivelled and very dry, or if the bark be rotten to any extent, reject them; for, though the tops may be plump and fresh, the injury to the roots will have extended to the whole top under the bark, though it cannot be seen. As above remarked, on cutting the body of the tree, a dark color will be observed around the surface of the wood under the bark, and the cuttings will not make roots. G. B. S.

LADIES' DEPARTMENT.

LONDON AND PARIS FASHIONS.—We are enabled by the late arrival to give our fair readers the fashions at the earliest date. Fur articles, will be almost exclusively in vogue this winter, and will be substituted for lace in most of the trimmings; they are greatly in demand. Gowns and satin habits will be trimmed at the bottom with a deep flounce of fur, and, for this purpose, preference will be given to chinchilla, that beautiful and delicate fur, whose shade blends so harmoniously with either blue, green, pink, or white satin. Ermine will also contribute its aid to temper the cold blast of winter, then fashion has decreed, that, upon quitting the ball-room or opera, nothing in the way of an extra envelope should be preferred to pelisses lined throughout with ermine. Boas, it is expected, will once more resume their former control, and small muffs be worn as last year. The fur of the sebeloni, or Canadian martin, will be used as ornamental trimmings for various shades of velvet. Pelisses of black satin are to be in fashion this winter—they must be worn very short, and wadded or lined; with some warm and thick material. The upper part of this dress is to be full of plaits, of one piece, and puckered at the shoulder. Large satin or velvet shawls wadded and trimmed with fur, or even lace, will be more in vogue than ever; there is also another variety, namely, satin shawls richly embroidered, and with deep fringes; it must not be forgotten to mention the black velvet shawl, with the lower border ornamented with stars, flowers, and other figures in jet, its effect is admirable; these mode of figured velvets are extremely handsome, and have been ordered by many fashionables. The shades chiefly selected for linings of shawls are blue, violet, and green, the vivid colors of last year become too common to retain the vogue. The votaries of fashion must be made acquainted with that charming innovation, the small pelerines of velvet worn in half toilette; their form is that of a cape, and they cross in front like a neckerchief, a la paysanne, the points rounded off; the top turns back upon the neck, and they are lined throughout with fancy colored satin. By means of a little lacing on the shoulders, the pelerine can be adapted to the shape of the wearer: the lacing terminates with two tassels, which rest on the sleeves, and produce a very graceful effect. These pelerines should be trimmed all around with black lace, they are very becoming over a white dress, and have the advantage of being at the same time elegant and warm, qualities, at least the latter, not to be despised at the present season.

Saturday Evening Post.

Edited by

G. R. GRAHAM & J. S. DU SOLLE.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1839.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"C." shall be inserted. We have revised and retouched his article—will he like it?

"J. S. C." is on file. The lines are quite meritorious indeed.

"S. H." we shall publish, although it is written in such a cramped hand and on such a morceau of paper, that it is with difficulty we can decipher it. Nevertheless the verses are good.

"JUVENAL," is not half so witty as he imagines.

"CARLOS." His puns will not answer. It is pun-ishment enough to read them.

"LOUISA," we are delighted with. Her poems, like her presence, are always welcome.

"TROUBADOUR'S" songs are not to our taste. Is not the following a bonne bouche?

> "Oh! Lady fair! come to me, dearest!
> Sweet as is candy to little one's lips,
> Is thy love to this well-covered bosom,
> Fen slip!"

That last observation is really marvel-lous.

"PEDRO." His style may be termed of the "composite" order. It is half stolen and half original; but, the worst of it is, the two are rather shabbily dove-tailed. The "end sticks out." Vide the following delicacy:

> "I'm sure that the smoke which so gracefully stole
> From out my cigar at the dead of the night,
> Resembled a mouse peeping out of a hole,
> And I said to myself what a glorious sight."

Several other communications are gratis-fully disposed, and several that we were unable to read, we have been compelled to let others design for.

CREDIT ON NEWSPAPERS.

We are pleased to perceive that a reform of the credit system in the newspaper world is becoming general, and that men of standing and ability are determined no longer to waste their talents and means by suffering their bills to go unpaid for years. Nearly all the well conducted newspaper establishments are giving their patrons notice, that they will hereafter require the money from new subscribers invariably in advance, and they at the same time notify their current subscribers that one year's credit is all that can be allowed. It is the only safe principle, and if at once adopted, will be found the most advantageous for all parties. As for ourselves we desire to be understood very clearly, WE INTEND TO ADOPT THE MEASURE, and as we are about to appear in our new dress, we shall make but very few visits to those who have suffered their bills to stand over one year, and shall expect those who are in arrears that length of time to forward their subscriptions at once. Those who desire the paper need not order it without sending the money. We have a good list of warm friends and true; and we shall therefore smoke our pipe in peace and quietness, and with the consciousness that we are laboring for those who are worthy. We hope to dazzle the eyes of some folks shortly, and we shall expect our friends the farmers, to be ready with a stout mug of cider to welcome us.

MISS SHIRREFF'S CONCERT.—Miss Shirreff and Mr. Wilson gave their first concert on Wednesday evening last at the Philadelphia Museum. The large saloon was crowded to excess with a most fashionable audience. "Meet me in the Willow Glen" and "The Rapture Dwelling" were sung by Miss Shirreff with inimitable sweetness, the latter song was encored three times by the audience. There is so much sprightliness and vivacity as well as grace and beauty about this young lady that we do not wonder at her popularity. Mr. Wilson sang "Rory O' Moore" and the "description of the Life of a Brigand" with much power and effect. The duett by Miss Shirreff and Mr. Wilson—"The Berks of Aberfeldie" was well performed, and it received the decided approbation of the audience.

In one thing, however, we must be permitted to find fault with the lady—her articulation is very imperfect—even in her best song "The Rapture Dwelling" we doubt much whether half the audience unacquainted with the words of the song, knew whether the lady was singing Dutch or Italian. This is a common fault with professed singers, and should be avoided.

DEATH BY SUICIDE.—A German named Kaiffer, recently committed suicide at St. Louis.

LATE AND INTERESTING FROM TEXAS.

We regret to learn by the Columbia steamer at New Orleans, bringing dates from Galveston to Nov. 7th, that the yellow fever is prevailing there and at Houston with alarming mortality. During the five days the Columbia lay at Galveston there were 26 deaths, among them Mr. Gladwin, editor of the Galvestonian. The steamer of war Zavala, and one or two other vessels of the Texan navy, were shortly to visit New Orleans. The currency notes in circulation were two millions—public debt four millions. An important piece of intelligence, confirmatory of previous rumors which had been doubted, is that Canales, commander of the Federal forces, was concentrating his troops, amounting to 1200 men, on the Rio Grande.—More important still, is the statement that Captain Ross, who had been sent by the Texan government to protect the settlements on the Nueces, has, with his company of 90 men and 400 other Americans, joined the forces of Canales. Also 100 Indians of a warlike tribe, living near Mier. The whole were well armed, and had plenty of ammunition, but no cannon. The greatest degree of enthusiasm existed among these troops, and their object was to recover the province of Rio Grande, attack first 800 centralist government troops in Mier, and then march on Matamoras. This movement may be the beginning of another revolution, and may result in an independent confederation of the northern provinces of Mexico, forming an Anglo-Spanish republic between Texas and Mexico. Should they prove successful, Texas will become the rallying point or place of transit for bodies of adventurous men from the United States, who will eventually plant on the richest portion of Mexico, abounding in mines of gold and silver, the standard of freedom and of republican institutions. Sooner or later the march of Anglo-Saxon power must subdue all that country to the shores of the Pacific.

LATE FROM RIO JANEIRO.

By the arrival of the brig Gen. Pinckney at Baltimore, we are in possession of news up to Oct. 5th.

"The subject of the financial measure about to be adopted by the Government was the principal matter which engaged the public attention. Money had been very scarce, treasury bills being negotiated with difficulty at 12 per cent. but the market subsequently became a little easier. The sales of coffee during the month were 18,000 bags, and the stock about 10,000 bags.

Advices had been received at Rio Janeiro from Rio Grande dated the 24th September, and from Porto Alegre dated the 19th ditto. Another successful sortie had been made from the latter place, in which the rebel commander Joze Leao, his brother, and about 90 men were killed. Calderon had arrived within about 15 leagues from Rio Grande, with a reinforcement for the legalists of 450 men, and 2000 horses; another reinforcement of 300 men, commanded by Jeronimo Jacintho, had arrived.

It was reported that Bento Gonsalves had been persuaded by Bento Manoel, to leave the rebel cause; other accounts state that he had been seized by the latter.

Private information led to the belief at Rio de Janeiro, that all the rebel chiefs, Netto excepted, had resolved to give themselves up to the government; but it remains to be seen, whether the change in the ministry may not interfere with such intention.

YOUNG VILLAINS.—Two young men one named James C. Prevost, formerly an apprentice to an engraver in New York named Dearborn, the other an apprentice to Durand & Co. bank note engravers, have been arrested in New York for supplying a couple of notorious counterfeiters with the bank note plates deposited for safe keeping in the safe of Durand's office.

The two counterfeiters, it appeared, got the two apprentices to engrave a plate for a $5 note, on the Merchants' Bank of Boston, for which they agreed to pay $150. The plate was completed, and three hundred impressions were struck off late at night, in Dearborn's office, the apprentice having provided himself with a key to obtain entrance. One of the counterfeiters proposed to have it delivered to him at night, at the cave in Hoboken, whither Prevost went with it. On arriving there several men sprang upon him, and one seized the plate and ran off with it. Prevost grappled one of them and they both rolled down a precipice about 30 feet high. The fellow he grappled with was left insensible on the ground, and he returned to the city, having received but $10 for the plate. A day or two after, one of the counterfeiters again called on them, and offered them $150 if they would agree to secure three genuine bank note plates, one of a post note of $500; one post note of $1000, and one of a post note of blank amount, and on a bank of that city, which were locked up in Durand's safe. The plates were secured, and next day taken to Mr. Dearborn's office, where a supply of ink and paper was had in readiness, and 300 impressions of the $1000 plates were worked off. Their operations, however, were discovered, and they arrested, and thus a most stupendous fraud prevented. Prevost and his companion are now in prison, awaiting their trial.

LITERARY.

THE CASKET—G. R. Graham, & Co. Philada.

The ornament to the present number of this old, and deservedly valued Magazine, is a gem, in the way of engraving. It is entitled the "Fruit Seller," and is a picturesque and voluptuous representation of an Indian Girl, standing beside her basket, musing upon the probable disposition of its rich contents. The countenance of the girl is a sweet one, full of thought, and beaming with expression. "My Mother in Heaven," is a delicious poem, replete with tenderness, and yet marred by a carelessness of diction, which the young writer—Miss E. H. Stockton—should sedulously avoid. "The Painter's Dream," by Miss C. H. Waterman, is particularly fine. It is replete with delicate imagery and choice language. "The Return" is well written, but exhibits a want of tact on the part of the writer, in its construction. True pathos can rarely be reached in lines of such diminished measurement. Of the prose articles, we should like to speak at length, but have not leisure to peruse them satisfactorily, to that end. The "Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio," and "Cruizing in the Last War," are evidently, however, from practised pens, and no commendation of ours could add to the reputation of the authors. The "Tale of Truth" looks like a very good one. D.

JACK SHEPPARD—Lea & Blanchard, Philada.

This is one of the most interesting works we have ever perused. We doubt if an individual can be found so devoid of curiosity as to be induced to lay aside "Jack Sheppard," without devouring with intense avidity both of the crowded volumes. The character of the hero and his adventures are somewhat exaggerated; but so graphically delineated as to fascinate the reader with their development. We need say no more, as doubtless every body will procure the novelty itself.

WALKS AND WANDERINGS—Carey & Hart.

Mere trash. A futile compound of bad language and idle sentiment.

THE LADY'S BOOK—L. A. Godey, Philada.

The December number of this popular periodical contains several articles of merit, beside a colored engraving of the Fashions, and a very pretty little Sea view indeed. Of the poetry, we like "Old Relics," by Miss Waterman, best, although we think

> "Memory's moonlight ray doth shine,"

a hurried and feeble expression. Mrs. Sigourney's poems we once entertained a great affection for; we begin to suspect that her graphic power and beauty of thought tames with the wear of years. "The Song of the Dying Improvisatrice" is correct and creditable. The prose articles of this number are all praiseworthy; some of them excellent. A thrilling Song of Mrs. Hemans's, set to Music, by Norton, is also an embellishment it contains, not to be overlooked.

"KINNE'S BLACKSTONE—Questions and Answers," Thomas Cowperthwait, & Co.

Blackstone's Commentaries have long been celebrated as the best compilation of the English law, that has ever been attempted, and the only way to make a thorough lawyer is to become as well acquainted with the four volumes of Sir William, as with one's alphabet. The present book is a kind of key to those invaluable volumes. As a guide to the preceptor, a help to the student, and the occasional companion of the practising lawyer, it is useful in a high degree. We commend it as a clue by which to recal, in order, the various positions of the inimitable Vinerian professor. But to a student who would be disposed to rely upon it, as a relief from laborious research in the original volumes, it would be hurtful in the last degree. They cannot make themselves lawyers, scholars, or statesmen, without severe study in their respective branches. This is the second edition of the work, and it has been much improved by the author, Mr. Asa Kinne, of the Natchez bar. The present edition contains a valuable addenda, in which the student will find the translations of the various phrases of Latin, Greek, or Norman French, which in the beginning of study perplex the learner. We commend the work to any one, as containing a brief and correct analysis of the English law.

A NEW PLAY BY BULWER.

Bulwer is rapidly becoming the most successful of living dramatists. As far as our individual taste is concerned, his dramas are too poetic for ordinary representation—too full of genius, dazzling and bewildering to the common eye, to please the common understanding. As finished poems for perusal in the quiet closet, they are beyond all praise; being as unexceptionable in sentiment as they are delicious in language and machinery. The new play is entitled the "Sea Captain, or the Birthright," and appears to stand a chance of becoming eminently popular. We copy the following sketch of its material from the London Times, 16th October.

In the first act we are introduced to Norman, a sea captain, who does not know his parents, but has been brought up by an old priest. He is in love with Violet, a kinswoman of Lady Arundel. This latter has a son, a wild, giddy youth, Lord Ashdale, whom she doats on. He also has an affection for Violet, which his mother does not approve, as she entertains higher views. We then find that Lady Ashdale is greatly held in fear by Sir Maurice, a distant relation, and miserly old man, who knows some dire secret, by which he can extort money from her. Norman has a meeting with his mistress, and is met by Lady Arundel, who, to the surprise of Violet, is not stern as usual, but invites the stranger courteously to the Castle.

In the second act Lady Arundel discovers to Sir Maurice that Norman, whom she seems to know, while the miser seems perfectly aware of some mysterious meaning, is under the roof, and that she knows of his love for Violet, which she intends to favor, and aid them to fly to some distant land. Sir Maurice, who but for her ladyship's son (we anticipate by the plural number) would be her next heir, tells Ashdale of this scheme, in hopes that he may raise up a quarrel between him and Norman, which may terminate in blood. Then comes a scene, where Norman is at table with Lady Ashdale and Violet, and recounts the perils of his life. Till his fourteenth year he lived with a priest, was then decoyed to sea by a pirate, who put him in chains for a while, and afterward freed him, when out of sight of land, assuring him that the gold of his unknown parents had caused this ill-usage. Indignant, he attempted to stab the pirate, but was thrown overboard. Rescued by a seaman, he followed him through several engagements, and was finally rewarded with wealth. Having ended his tale, he is left alone with Violet, and is nearly involved in a quarrel with young Ashdale, who grows jealous.

In the third act Violet's flight is agreed on; she is to meet her lover at an old chapel, and the white plume in Norman's hat is to mark his figure in the night. Sir Maurice tells the lady that Onslow, a priest, has certain documents, at which she is dreadfully frightened, and bribes the old knight to get them. He has overheard the arrangement for Violet's flight, and communicates full particulars to Ashdale. Gausen, a pirate, is employed by Sir Maurice to get the documents from Onslow, who recognises him as an old offender, and is therefore murdered by the ruffian. Norman rushes in at the murder of the priest, who is his foster father, and learns that he is the eldest son of Lady Arundel by her first secret marriage with one of low birth. The documents that prove his right are placed in his hands by the dying man.

In act the fourth, we find Sir Maurice greatly annoyed at missing the documents, and persuading Gausen to be at the trysting-place at the same time with Violet, Ashdale, and Norman, and to murder both the latter. Then comes a scene between Norman and his mother, the former boldly announcing his discovery. She is horror-stricken, and at first endeavors to repel him indignantly, but is unable. She then has recourse to entreaty. He ask for her blessing, but her love for her younger son prevents her from giving it. He rushes from the stage, and she falls senseless.

The fifth act is the general wind up. Ashdale has put on Norman's hat that Violet may mistake him for her lover, and is by that very Norman rescued from the ruffians. Still the love for Violet is a cause for discord. Ashdale draws his sword upon Norman, when Lady Arundel rushes on, and owns the latter to be her elder son. Ashdale is, of course, mortified, but Norman generously burns the documents, and unwilling to disclose the history of his mother's shame, leaves Ashdale in possession of his property, and resolves to continue a seaman, blessed alone with the hand of Violet.

We have received the eighth and ninth numbers of Dr. A. H. McNair's domestic medical work entitled "Suggestions to Parents and Others," they contain an account of the cause and treatment of several diseases, among which are some of the most distressing nervous affections.

For the utility and character of the work see an article in another column of to-day's paper.

Popular Lectures.

MERCANTILE LIBRARY COMPANY.—William M. Meredith, Esq. delivered the lecture before the Mercantile Library Company, on Friday evening last. The subject was "Intemperance." The lecturer at once announced to the audience that he did not intend to dwell upon Physical intemperance. The intemperance of speech and action—the intemperance of military ambition, of political intolerance, the intemperance in opinions upon morals, were all dwelt upon with effect. The lecture was a short one, and it illustrated handsomely the doctrine of the lecturer. In truth, the only fault to be found with the lecture was its brevity, as we confess ourselves disciples of the old school, we could have listened to Mr. Meredith for two hours at least. We consider him one of the soundest lawyers, and the wittiest man at this bar.—There was a sort of quiet humor that shone through his whole discourse, which rendered the speaker interesting, and the lapse of time scarcely perceptible. He thought that intemperance of speech was quite prevalent among all classes and professions, "lawyers excepted." It was too bad that he did not except the ladies.

ATHENIAN INSTITUTE.—William B. Reed, Esq. lectured before the Athenian Institute, on Tuesday Evening last. His subject was "The romance of the Revolution." As a whole the lecture was good, but it was too long. The audience gave many signs of impatience as the lecture was protracted far beyond the time, and they had been kept waiting nearly an hour with the gaslights in full blaze. Mr. Reed, is a man of a fine mind, but his delivery is most monotonous. He measures off sentences, as if he were measuring tape.

His taste is not so good as his fancy; some of his pictures of the revolution were fine, and the contrast between our own, and the revolution of France was strongly drawn. But what shall we say of the taste, which prompted such an opening as the following "the curse of labor, like the curse of tooth drawing is upon our race." What other feelings than those of disgust could such an allusion awaken. There were passages, nevertheless in the discourse which would do honor to any mind. The death chamber of Washington, and the last scene were exceedingly impressive and pathetic. The allusion to the death bed of Napoleon, was not so good, it wanted the coloring of nature. The theme was an ample one, and long as the lecture was, the orator had not time to do justice to the theme.

A NEW POEM, AND A NEW WIFE.—Thomas Campbell, the author of the Pleasures of Hope, is said to have a new poem in the press. He is fifty years of age, and yet, rumor says, is about to form a matrimonial connexion of the most eligible description.

AMERICAN SECURITIES IN ENGLAND.—New York State 5 per cents 1845 50, 84a5; Pennsylvania 5 per cents 1868, '64, '65, 79½a80; Ohio 6 per cents 1856 60, 85a½; Indiana 5 per cents 1861 '66, 68a70; do. sterling bonds 1863, 79a80; South Carolina 5 per cent. sterling bonds 1866, 90; Louisiana 5 per cents (Baring & Co.) 1844-47, 50, 52, 87a8; Maryland 5 per cents sterling 1850, 89; Alabama 5 per cents sterling bonds 1858 9 66, 80a8; New York city 5 per cents 76a8; U. NEW BUILDINGS.—We learn from the North American, that there have been two hundred and sixty-seven new buildings erected in the district of Spring Garden since the first of January, 1839—sixteen of which are four stories in height, one hundred and ninety-nine of three stories, thirty-nine of two stories, and thirteen one story, among which are one hundred and ninety-nine dwelling houses, one catholic church, and two meeting houses.

A CALL.—The Rev. Abel C. Thomas, late Pastor of the Lombard street Universalist Society, of this city, has received and accepted an invitation to become Pastor of the First Universalist Society of Lowell, Mass.

IMPROVEMENTS IN SOUTHWARK.—During the past season there have been five four story buildings erected in the District of Southwark, sixty-two of three stories, and thirty-two of two stories, besides a large number of frame back buildings.

PENNSYLVANIA COAL TRADE.—The Philadelphia Commercial List states that operations for the season are now nearly over in the mining districts. The supplies brought to market for the season have been as follows:—From the Schuylkill region to Nov. 1st, 391,510 tons.—From the Lehigh region to Nov. 6th, Mauch Chunk, Beaver Meadows, Hazleton, &c. 212,202 tons. From the Lackawana region to Nov. 2, 112,570 tons. From the Swatara region to Nov. 1, 26,633 tons. From the Susquehanna, Lykeh's Valley, &c. about 90,000 tons. Total, 832,983 tons.

Personal Items.

GONE TO TEXAS.—Gov. Poindexter has removed to Texas.

HE IS IN HEALTH.—The Hon. Daniel Webster was in excellent health, at the last dates from Paris.

DISCUSSION.—Professor Olmsted has consented to reply to an exposition which Mr. Espy shall make, in Clinton Hall, of his (Mr. E.'s) theory.

CATLIN HAS GONE.—Mr. Catlin, with his incomparable collection of Indian portraits, groups, Western landscapes and aboriginal curiosities, sailed in the packet ship Roscius for London. In addition to his paintings, he likewise takes in company two grisly bears, from the Rocky Mountains. We hope the English will appreciate him.

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.—Mr. Graham is lecturing at Troy on Courtship and Marriage.

N. P. WILLIS.—It will be seen by the following letter to the editor of the London Morning Post that Willis has been compelled to make the amende honorable. We hope yet to see him cured of his penchant for small gossip:

To the Editor of the Morning Post.

Sir,—In a Morning Post of a week or two since you adopt an error from an American paper, which I trust to your candor to correct. After giving an extract from a published letter of mine, in which the Hon. Miss Pitt is described as one of the Queen's Maids of Honor, the paragraph comments upon my quoting this lady (whom I have not the honor of knowing) as an authority for some opinions which follows relative to the Queen. By reading the passage again you will observe that my mention of Miss Pitt ends with a description of her as a lady filling a marked position at the English Court, and that neither she nor any other lady is named as my authority for what follows. My absence from this country was the cause of your not receiving earlier this important correction of an error. Your obedient servant, N. P. WILLIS.

DEATH IN CHARLESTON.—The Charleston papers announce the death of William McDow, Esq. a distinguished citizen of that place.

HE IS THE PRESIDENT.—James Rose, Esq. has been elected President of the South Western Railroad Bank.

DEATH BY FIRE.—A lad named Chas. S. Ambrister, was so dreadfully burned by his clothes taking fire in New York, a day or two ago, that he died in the course of a few hours.

THE VICE PRESIDENT IN ARKANSAS.—Vice President Johnson arrived at Little Rock, Arkansas, on the 29th ult.

ANOTHER NATIONAL LOSS.—General Lawrence Lewis, a nephew, and the last of Washington's near blood relations, died at the seat of G. W. P. Custis, in Virginia, on the 20th inst.

HOW THEY TREAT AMERICANS.—Mr. Webster was received in Paris in the most flattering manner, by the Royal family and distinguished citizens of that metropolis.

Political Intelligence.

TENNESSEE LEGISLATORS.—The present Tennessee House of Representatives is composed of forty-six Farmers; thirteen Lawyers; seven Merchants; five Doctors; two Tailors; one Silversmith, and one Forgeman.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.—The contest in Mississippi has been unusually warm. The Van Buren party appear to have carried the State by about 1600 votes.

A GENERAL DELEGATE.—Gen. Van Rensselaer has been elected as the Harrisburg Delegate, from the Albany District, New York.

MASSACHUSETTS.—We learn that in Boston twelve Whigs were elected by a majority of 1300 and eight by a majority of 800, over the Van Buren men.

Morton's (V. B.) majority for Governor, is ascertained to be 269 over Everett. Scattering in 100 towns, (about half in the State) 300. The probable Whig majority in the House of Representatives will be from forty to sixty.

In the Senate, the number is now about equal, but the vacancies, some fifteen or twenty, are to be supplied by the House.

Financial Record.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.—The following is a summary of the statement made by the United States Bank to the Auditor General The statement is so voluminous that not one in ten would examine it, we therefore give the abstract. It will be seen that the surplus amounts to $4,869,909 67 over the capital and all liabilities of the Bank:

PHILADELPHIA BANKS.—Nothing further in relation to the resumption of the Philadelphia Banks. The small notes of Delaware and New Jersey circulate freely in our city, and we have few complaints with regard to small change, although considerable difficulty is still experienced.

NEW YORK.—No change in the condition of money affairs in New York. The rates out of doors are still high, varying from 1 to 2 per cent. a month.

KENTUCKY BANKS.—The statement of the Kentucky Banks to the 15th of October, shows the aggregate specie of the Bank of Kentucky, Northern Bank and Bank of Louisville amounts to $1,155,350 against an active circulation of $3,645,228, or 31½ cents to the dollar, divided as follows:

	Specie.	Circulation.	Per Ct.
Bank of Ky.	$469,963 to	$1,916,386	24
Northern Bank,	563,129	1,560,081	36
Bank of Louis'e,	122,256	168,861	73
	$1,155,350	$3,645,218	31½

The immediate liabilities of the Bank of Kentucky, aside from circulation, are, to other banks $686,113, Depositors $391,261, Miscellaneous $50,363 available resources. other than specie, Bills of Exchange $1,513,185, State and City Bonds $1,605,000, due from other Banks $396,997, other bank notes $184,827, Miscellaneous $58,045. The Northern Bank owes to depositors $240,923, other banks $226,630, Miscellaneous $10,345; availables, other than specie, Bills of Exchange $1,417,140, State and City Bonds $790,000, notes and checks of other banks $161,261.

GEORGIA.—A bill reported in the Legislature of Georgia, at its present session, to repeal the General Banking law of the State—a law, in its principal provisions, like the New York law on the same subject—was rejected on the 14th inst, by a vote of 39 to 48.

ALABAMA.—To the 1st inst. the Tuscaloosa and Montgomery branches of the State Bank and the stock banks at Mobile, had not suspended specie payments. We have already noticed that the Huntsville branch had determined to hold out.

TENNESSEE BANKS.—In the Legislature of Tennessee, a member of the House submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, that the Bank of Tennessee, the Union Bank, the Planters' Bank, the Farmers and Merchants' Bank of Memphis, and all other banks in Tennessee, and all their branches, are hereby required to resume and continue the payment of specie for all their obligations that are due, and as fast as they become due and are presented for payment.

"Provided that the bank of Tennessee shall not be required to resume the payment of specie forthwith unless the Union and Planters' banks will agree to resume and do resume the payment of specie at the same time."

In this shape the resolution was passed by a vote of 62 to 11.

NASHVILLE.—The Nashville Whig says:—"We have but little to note in the exchanges. The Brokers are buying U. S. Bank notes and other Eastern funds at 7a8 per cent. Silver 7a8 do. Gold 10a12 do. Notes of the principal banks of Tennessee 2½a3 do. Kentucky 4a5 do. Indiana 4a5 do. Illinois 3a4 do. New Orleans 4a5 do Alabama, Huntsville, par a 1 dis. Decatur and Mobile 2a3 dis. Mississippi, uncertain, best banks 10a12 dis. The Bank of Tennessee continues to check at sight on Philadelphia at 3½ premium. Union and Planters' Bank at 6 months, at par. One of our brokers is drawing on Philadelphia at 6 prem. for currency."

SPECIE PAYING BANKS.—The Banks of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri—some are now paying specie and others are not. Of the Banks in Ohio which do pay specie, are the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company, Franklin Bank of Cincinnati, Lafayette Bank, at Cincinnati, Franklin Bank at Columbus, Clinton Bank of Columbus, Bank of Hamilton, the banks of St. Clairsville, of Marietta, of Zanesville, of Muskingum, of Mount Pleasant, and of New Lisbon. The Kentucky and Indiana banks do not pay specie. The State bank of Missouri, we understand, does. And we also learn that the State Bank of Illinois has suspended, and the Springfield Journal is of the opinion that the other banks have pursued the same course.

Specie at New Orleans on the 16th, 6 and 8 per cent. premium.

Specie was selling at St. Louis on the 15th at 8 per cent. premium.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENT.—The Bank of Virginia, at Portsmouth continuing to pay specie for its notes, the Secretary of the Navy has ordered the Navy Agent and Pursers on that station to make deposits in it. It is added that the Secretary of War will give like directions to the Paymasters of the Army.

THE SPECIE IS COMING.—The steamer Pizarro, which arrived at St. Louis on the 11th, from Missouri river, brought $60,000 in specie, received at Independence, from Santa Fe.

COUNTERFEIT POST NOTES.—Counterfeit post notes purporting to be of the United States Bank, for five hundred dollars are in circulation. One was sent to a mercantile house in this city, by whom it was deposited in the Pennsylvania Bank. When presented at the United States Bank, it was marked as counterfeit; not so much, from a want of resemblance to the true notes and signatures of the President and Cashier, Mr. Biddle and Mr. Dunlap, as from a knowledge that notes from that plate are not out.

A COUNTERFEIT.—The Columbia Courant states that counterfeit five dollar bills purporting to be issued by the Farmer's Bank of Reading are in circulation. They are signed Isaac Eckert, Prest. Benneville, Keim, Cash. and are payable to G. E. Ludwig. This is an entirely new issue, and not mentioned in the Detectors. So look out. The one before us is dated September 1, 1831—numbered 3086—letter 1, and is a miserable specimen of workmanship.

NEW COUNTERFEIT.—Three dollar counterfeit bills on the Oneida Bank of Utica, N. Y. are in circulation.

ANOTHER COUNTERFEIT.—Counterfeit $3 notes on the Oneida Bank, at Utica, are in circulation.

BANK OF THE STATE OF MISSOURI.—Considerable excitement prevailed in St. Louis about the 14th instant, on account of the course pursued by the Bank of Missouri, in determining to receive and pay out nothing but its own notes, gold and silver, and the notes of specie paying banks. A public meeting was held on the 14th, and resolutions expressing much dissatisfaction were adopted.

INDIAN NEWS.

SCOUTING.—The Tallahassee Star speaks in high praise of the recent excursion or forage into the Seminole country, by Governor Call, at the head of 200 draughted men. The scout was an extensive and efficient one, embracing the entire country of swamp and hammock quite through to the Suwanee. The Indians have not been so hotly pursued for a long time. The troops were frequently close upon them; they fired on them once or twice; routed them from their secret hiding places, and drove them out of the district.

FROM FLORIDA.—Advices from Florida to the 21st bring the melancholy intelligence of the decease at Tampa, of Capt. R. H. Peyton, Ass't. Quarter Master, of Capt. Barker, 1st Infantry, and of the lady and child of Capt. Seawell.

Those whom the Indian rifle has spared of our gallant army in Florida, and their families, disease has the present season more or less afflicted.

THE CHEROKEES.—The latest accounts from the Southwest state that General Arbuckle persists in his demand for the murderers of Ridge to be surrendered to him, and has made a requisition on the Governors of Arkansas and Missouri for military aid.

Miscellaneous Paragraphs.

PUBLIC GARDEN AT NEW ORLEANS.—The Boston times says:—"They talk of having a public garden at New Orleans. What will they make it of? It will grow fifty young alligators to the square rod!" Yes, and bull-frogs enough to fill up the spaces between them.

DEAF AND DUMB IN VIRGINIA.—The Institution for the instruction of the Blind, and the Deaf and Dumb, at Staunton, Virginia, is now open. The Spectator of that place announces the arrival there of the following gentlemen who are to take charge of it: the Rev. Joseph D. Tyler, Principal of the Deaf and Dumb, Dr. J. C. M. Merrillat, Principal of the Blind, and Mr. William Graham, Teacher of the Blind.

POETIC DOORKEEPER.—Jesse E. Dow, the author of some many pieces of poetry, extensively circulated over the signature of "J. E. D." is a candidate for door-keeper to the National House of Representatives.

TRIAL OF THE AMISTAD AFRICANS.—The case of the Africans of the Amistad has been postponed till the first Tuesday in January next, on account of the sickness of the interpreter, which, rendered him unable to attend. The prisoners were sent back to New Haven.

RUNNING OFF WITH A DAUGHTER.—In the N. York Court of Common Pleas, some days ago, Mr. J. H. Potter brought an action against his father-in-law, Mr. S. Shaw, for abducting the daughter of the latter, wife of the plaintiff. Verdict for defendant.

AN EXCELLENT TOOTH POWDER.—We can instruct the ladies in the use of the simplest and pleasantest tooth powder imaginable, better than all the Chlorides, and Orris washes in the world—RECIPE.—Burn grains of coffee very slowly until they are carbonised—powder them, and use daily with a soft brush.

CAN'T PARDON HIM.—Governor Seward has refused a pardon to Robert Miller, convicted at Utica for the murder of Barney Leddy.

YELLOW FEVER AT ST. AUGUSTINE.—This city at the latest accounts was still sorely afflicted with the prevailing epidemic of the South. Among the deaths there have been several army and navy officers.

PRICE OF GEORGIA COTTON.—New cotton was selling at Augusta, Ga. at the last dates, at 8 and 9 cents.

THE PRICE OF FLOUR.—Flour at Cincinnati on the 20th, $4 25.

JAIL BIRDS FLOWN.—On the night of the 5th inst. the jail of the parish of Iberville was broken open, and three prisoners escaped. The dungeon contained four inmates—all of different nations—there being an Irishman, a Dutchman, a Frenchman, and an American. The first three were charged with horse stealing, and the last with murder.

A LIBEL ON "THE QUEEN."—The Passengers by the British Queen, according to their own statement, have had a hard time of it. They come out in a card in the New York Courier and complain that the vessel was crowded to excess; that the bread and butter was wretched stuff, the water revolting to the sight and taste, and a general want of accomodation and convenience altogether unexpected. They therefore pronounce the Queen to be unworthy of the patronage of the public.

BEAVER SILK.—The Inquirer notices some beautiful Silk grown and manufactured at Beaver, Pa. We learn that from four to five thousand yards of silk of the usual width and of the very best quality have been manufactured at Beaver during the present season. Some of the specimens of ribbons may be noticed as very beautiful indeed, and calculated to make the most favorable impression as to the powers of the country in this particular. We trust that the day is not remote when Silk will constitute an important feature in the manufactures of this country.

AFFAIRS OF LOWER CANADA.—The New York Express says, "it is intended to raise a corps of Volunteer Infantry in Quebec, for service during the ensuing winter. It is to consist of between four and five hundred men, formed into six companies, with the usual proportion of officers and sergeants, and to be under the command of Lieutenant Col. the Hon. James Hope, of the Cold stream Guards, who rendered the Queen's Volunteers, of last winter, so efficient and well disciplined a corps. It is not the present intention of Government to raise any other corps of Volunteers in Quebec."

HOW THEY MANAGE IN FRANCE.—Eighty-nine failures occurred in Paris during the month of September, for sums exceeding, in the whole 6,300,000 francs. In October, the number of bankrupts would not be much inferior, for, on the 23d, it already amounted to seventy, whose debts were estimated at 4,000,000 francs.

A JOKE EXPLODED.—The Marquis of Waterford has abandoned his Tournament scheme.

PRECIOUS METALS.—The following were the exports, from England, of the precious metals for the week ending the 24th of October:—Gold coin to Mogadore, 400 ounces; do. bars to Hamburg, 1536 ounces. Silver coin to New York, 10,000 ounces; do. to Hamburg, 252,000 ounces; do. to St. Petersburg, 195,000 ounces; do. to Gibraltar, 3727 ounces.

PRUSSIAN WIT.—In Prussia, where the press is under the surveillance of a censorship, the conductors of newspapers are often compelled to resort to stratagem, in order to communicate to the public intelligence distasteful to the ministry. Thus the flight of Don Carlos from Spain was communicated to the inhabitants of Berlin under the guise of an advertisement announcing a donkey race.

CARTER, THE LION DRIVER.—Mr. Carter has attracted crowds at Astley's, (London) to see him drive his lion to the top of a mountain. It is, beyond a doubt, one of the most astonishing performances that has been exhibited in this or any other theatre. The season has been extended for a month, for the express purpose of showing Mr. Carter and his exploits to the public.

QUEEN VIC'S INTENDED.—Prince Albert, the suitor of Victoria, is said to have excellent spirits, to speak English fluently, and to be a very dashing, good-looking fellow.

COME FROM THE DICKENS.—A new work from the pen of Boz, is announced in the London papers as in preparation.

THANKSGIVING.—Thanksgiving is to be observed on Thursday next in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, R. Island, Maine, and Michigan, by an aggregate of probably not less than 4,500,000 persons.

OUR BORDER.—Gen. Scott passed through Cleveland to Detroit, about a week ago, on a tour of inspection of the military posts on that frontier. This step has been rendered necessary in consequence of anticipated movements by the Canadian patriots.

HAYTI.—Letters from Hayti state that the inhabitants were prevented from assembling in any number beyond three or four, either in the public streets or private houses, under pain of being considered public conspirators.

WHO WANTS A NEWSPAPER?—The establishment of the Baltimore Chronicle is offered for sale.

AUTUMN STILL REIGNS.—New Orleans was visited with copious showers on the 15th.

BAPTIST CONVENTION.—The N. Jersey Baptist Convention met at Newark last week. Receipts for Convention 1400 dollars; for foreign missions 600 dollars, and for same by agent 1300 dollars. Addition to the churches in the bounds of the Convention during the year 700.

A YOUNG MURDERER.—Godfrey Zaphe, a boy of fifteen years of age, was on the 15th inst. put on his trial at Jeffersonville, Indiana, for the murder of Valentine Christ, a play mate of his.

ANOTHER FIRE IN MOBILE.—On the 8th inst, a fire occurred in a warehouse, with a front store on St. Francis street, at the rear of the Alabama Hotel, both in the occupancy of Messrs. Ellis & Green, and owned by G. & J. Wilkins, Esq. It was at first supposed to have originated from some lime in the warehouse, but was afterward believed to have been the result of incendiarism, as the fire was discovered in a part of the warehouse distinct from the lime. The losses at this fire amount to $12,000—no insurance—divided as follows: Mr. Williams, (buildings) $7000, T. Lesesne, (coffee) $2200, W. H. Kelly, (furniture) $1000, Ellis & Green, (merchandise) $1800.

THE SLAVE TRADERS.—The New York Commercial alludes to the arrest of five individuals in Baltimore, charged with participation in the slave trade, says that the grand jury has sent to New York for additional evidence, and that, in compliance with an order from the U. S. District Attorney, Mr. Butler, the British Consul, has sent on documents and a seaman from one of the British cruisers.

THEY COULD'NT FIGHT.—The contemplated duel between Messrs Stanley and Kennedy of North Carolina, has been prevented by the friends of the parties, by whose exertions the difficulty was adjusted in a manner satisfactory and honorable to both parties.

IT WON'T DO.—A London letter states that Gen. Henderson has not succeeded in inducing the British Government to recognise Texas. The Slavery Question was the difficulty.

PUBLIC WORKS IN ILLINOIS.—The proposed rail-roads and public works in Illinois comprise 1340 miles, and will cost $11,500,000.

WHEAT AT WHEELING.—The Wheeling Times says:—Wheat still commands 50 cents in Massillon, but buyers are unwilling to pay all cash at that. Oats and corn do not command cash at any price.

AN EMPTY PRISON.—The jail at Chambersburg is at present without a prisoner.

CLOSE AFFECTION.—A man in New York had his pocket picked of $300 last week by a female who threw her arms around his neck and squeezed the wallet from his pocket.

IN PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR.—So says an Ohio paper, in mentioning the fact that a man in that State has had twenty-four children by one wife, and eighteen of them are males, now living and capable of bearing arms.

SMART BUCKS.—In Lewis county, N. Y. the two opposing members of Assembly, were brothers of the name of Buck. The Whig Buck drove his antagonist off of the field.

TEXAS AND MEXICO.—"It is asserted," says the Globe, "in a late French journal, that Texas is disposed to assume one million pounds sterling of the Mexican debt due to England, on condition of the recognition of her independence by that Government, and that negotiations are now going on for that object."

STOPPED HIS POLITICS.—Horace Greely, Esq. has withdrawn from the editorial chair of the New York Whig. He will for the future, devote himself exclusively to his own paper, the New Yorker.

A STEAMER SUNK.—Steamer Havana, from Quincy for New Orleans, with a cargo of flour, corn, &c. sunk at island No. 21—boat and cargo total loss.

YELLOW FEVER IN TEXAS.—The yellow fever is said to be still raging with considerable violence at Houston. Numbers dying daily.

SOUTHERN MEDICAL STUDENTS.—The Medical College at Charleston has 200 students.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.—A memorial to Congress for a reduction of postage, is in circulation in Boston.

STEAMBOAT ON FIRE.—Steamer George Collier, bound to New Orleans, took fire while laying at Vicksburg, and was saved only by the great exertions of the crew.

THE SHIP VILLE DE LYONS.—This beautiful 'Havre Packet," for the safety of which considerable anxiety had been felt,—arrived in New York on Saturday last, having experienced head winds and a great deal of heavy and bad weather. All safe.

HOW THE YANKEES SUCCEED.—Mr. Woodbridge, the Governor elect of Michigan, is from the town of Norwich, Massachusetts. He is said to be a talented man.

BREAK DOWN THE ICY BARRIERS.—The ice in the Erie canal was broken up, and a passage cleared through it before the rain storm, and moderate weather on Saturday and Sunday, and the great number of boats loaded with produce of course made their way to Albany, a circumstance of great importance to the interests of all classes of the community.

THEY HAD NO RIGHT TO VOTE.—The Grand Jury of New York have found bills of indictment against John Van Tassell and Abraham Ryerson, for illegal voting.—They were arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and were remanded for trial.

PASSING SMALL NOTES, PAST FORGIVENESS.—In the case of S. Stettinius, found guilty of passing notes of a less denomination than five dollars in the District of Columbia, the court ordered him to be fined fifty dollars each in two cases. An appeal was made from this decision to the Circuit Court.

HERE COMES THE SPECIE.—The Cincinnati Republican states that specie to the amount of 80 or $90,000 was drawn from the Commercial Bank on the 20th inst. carried on drays to the landing, and from thence shipped to the east.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.—George L. Douglass, to be Deputy Postmaster of the United States at Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, in the place of James M. Campbell, removed.

RATHER USELESS FREEDOM.—It appears that the Free Banking Law of Georgia, passed last winter, is a dead letter, a single institution only having gone into operation under it. Its provisions and penalties are strict and severe.

FRANCE'S TREATY WITH TEXAS.—Gen. Henderson, who arrived at New York in the British Queen, brought over the Texan Treaty with France.

THE SECRETARY BACK.—The Secretary of State has arrived at Washington, from Georgia.

HOW THEY DIE IN NEW YORK.—Deaths in New York last week, 135.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrival of the British Queen!

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steam packet British Queen arrived at New York, at 9 o'clock on Saturday night, with one hundred and ninety passengers, after a somewhat long and tedious voyage, for a steam ship. By her, and through the attention of the efficient newspaper agent in Liverpool, Mr. Wilmer, we have files of the Liverpool and London journals to the 3d of the present month.

We proceed to annex all the details which possess the slightest interest for American readers.

The English Money Market.—The intelligence on this head is decidedly favorable.—Money was easier at the latest dates, and a better feeling prevailed. Consols left off at from 90½ to 90⅝, which is a very slight advance since our last. Bank of England Stock stood at 180. We believe the last quotation was 178. A report of the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, was circulated in the city after the arrival of the mail, but it was doubtless altogether unfounded, as we meet with nothing of the kind in the English papers.

Foreign stocks of every description in London, were at a low ebb. Nothing of importance doing in any of them. One of the English papers states that little or no more specie can be expected from France.

Wheat and Flour.—There was a slight decline in prices up to Nov. 2d, the latest average weekly quotation of Mark Lane being 66s. 5d. per qr.; whereas the mean of six weeks, was 68s. 2d. The duty is 16s. 8d.

Liverpool Corn Market, Oct. 29.—The arrivals of English, Irish and Foreign Wheat since Tuesday last, contain a fair supply; we have also to notice a tolerable quantity of pease from abroad, and increasing receipts of Oatmeal from Ireland, but of other articles collectively, the imports of the week are only moderate. As with very fine weather since Friday, the farmers are still exclusively occupied in outdoor labors, the deliveries of home grown Wheat are small for the moment, and the prices of such during the week have, in consequence, been well supported. In the course of yesterday, several further parcels of Foreign Wheat were taken for Irish account and consumption here; and influenced by the improvement in London, our market this morning opened at an advance of 2d to 3d per 70 lb. on the rates of Tuesday last, for all descriptions, which, although tending to prevent any lively or considerable operations, a moderately fair extent of business was done. Foreign Flour was in request, and in partial instances obtained 6d. to 1s. per barrel over the terms of last week, but in English and Irish there was no amendment. Malting Barley and Beans were 1s. to 2s. per quarter dearer, and Pease supported former prices, with a good demand for each. New Oats, being still in short supply, acquired 1d. and old fully 2d. per 45 lb. more then last week, at which both sold rather freely. Oatmeal, although more plentiful, was in tolerable demand, and brought quite as high prices as on this day se'nnight.

A report dated November 1st says:—

In consequence of the prevalence of strong east winds, the arrivals into this port between Tuesday and to-day, have been very few in number, and the supplies of Grain, Flour, and Oatmeal comparatively trivial. During that period the trade for all kinds of Wheat exhibited increasing firmness, and although in the value fine and very inferior qualities, little variation was apparent, the intermediate sorts of foreign commanded 2d. to 3d. per 70 lbs. over the rates last noted; and besides moderate sales to consumers, several cargoes were taken by speculative buyers.

The Harvest in Ireland is pronounced deficient, and much of that which is gathered in, of inferior quality, owing to the heavy rains. The crops of England are also below an average.

THE COTTON MARKET.

The Liverpool papers to the 30th, shew a decline in Cotton, of ⅛d; it rallied slightly on the 31st, and the demand was pretty brisk. The Liverpool Standard of the 1st, has the following:

"There has been a moderate business done throughout the week, but without any alteration in prices; the sales on Tuesday were 3500 bales, 500 for export, and 700 on speculation; on Wednesday 4500 bales to the trade—American at 5¼d to 8d, under 680 Stuart at 5¼ to 5½; to day about 5000 bales of all kinds."

THE STATE OF TRADE.

We copy the following paragraphs from the latest papers:

Manchester.—During the last three days, two additional failures have been announced, both, we believe, in some degree connected with the one to which we alluded on Friday, and one of them of considerable magnitude—the debts being variously stated at from 42,000l. to 50,000l. The other, we believe, is of small importance. Owing to these failures, and to the general pressure on the market, the demand for yarn was extremely limited, and the prices were not only generally lower, but exceedingly unsteady—sales being made at the same time at rates varying ¼d. to ½d. per lb. for the same qualities and descriptions of yarns. Manufactured goods of all kinds were also in very limited demand, and at prices a shade lower than those of Tuesday last. In consequence of the unfavorable appearance of the market, a meeting of the spinners of coarse yarn, in Oldham and the neighborhood, was held on Monday evening, when it was resolved to work only nine hours per day for the next six weeks. The establishments to which this resolution refers are, however, generally of very limited extent, and the diminution of produce cannot be reckoned at more than 40,000 weight a week.

Rochdale Flannel Market, Monday, Oct. 28.—We have had another dull market to day, but little or no change in the prices. Wool has not been much inquired after, and its price nearly stationary.

Huddersfield Market. Oct. 29.—If any thing, this was a worse market than last week, there being fewer buyers and less demand; but, although the accidental sales are not large, it is satisfactory to know that special orders are sufficiently extensive to employ the greater part of the operatives. The manufacturers determinately keep from creating heavy stocks, so that prices remain firmer than could be expected, and when the demand increases, they may suddenly rise. Wools of finer sorts are lower, while the coarser qualities remain pretty firm. A general dullness prevails the warehouses.—Manchester Guardian.

A BATTLE IN INDIA.

The Dethronement of the Rajah Sattara—Siege and Capture of Ghuznee.

The English papers are full of exultation, in consequence of news from Bombay, in relation to the British possessions in India, including the dethronement of the Rajah of Satara. On the 23d of June, the British artillery opened a tremendous fire upon the citadel of Ghuznee, which, garrisoned by 3500 Afghans, and commanded by a son of the Ex-King of Cabool, was speedily captured.—500 of the garrison were slain, and the rest taken prisoners. The British lost 191 in killed, wounded, and missing. The effect of this victory was the dispersion of Dost Mahomed's army, and the peaceable entrance of Shah Soojah into the capital of his dominions. The British account proceeds:

"The military movements of the past month have not been confined to the army of the Indus. Two field forces have been directed to assemble; one composed of troops on the Bengal establishment, is ordered to rendezvous at Nusseerabad, for the purpose of attacking Joudpore. It consists of four squadrons of native cavalry, one troop of horses, and two and a half companies of foot artillery, with six regiments of native infantry, two companies of sappers and miners; the whole being commanded by Major-General R. Hopton. The other is commanded by Major-General Wilson, and consists of one cavalry and two infantry brigades, with proportionate details of artillery and engineers. The force is drawn from the Madras establishment, and will assemble at Adoni, for the reduction of Kurnool. Government appears determined to chastise the insolence of the native Princes. Our success in Afghanistan, the preparations against Joudpore and Kurnool, and the recent deposition of the Sattara Rajah, will probably induce even the most refractory to succumb. The reports circulated during the past month relative to Ava and Nepaul are rather contradictory. On the whole it would appear that the Nepaulese will choose their own time to make an attack upon us, whilst, at the same time, the orders which have been issued to the General Service corps in Bengal, as well as the detention of the Jupiter, and his majesty's 61st regiment in Ceylon, would induce us to believe that the supreme government intends to take the first favorable chance for chastising the insolence of the Burmese monarch."

The Bombay Times, whence these accounts are gathered, next notices the dethronement of the Rajah of Sattara. That paper says:

"A little before day break on Wednesday last, the time allowed him for the acceptance of the terms having expired without his compliance, the Resident, supported by the 8th regiment of Native Infantry and other troops, proceeded to the palace of the Rajah, and arrested his Highness, who surrendered himself at once, and was sent under an escort to the village of Nimbgaum, about seven miles from Sattara, and about eight o'clock the same morning, Appa Sahib, the ex-Rajah's brother, was proclaimed his successor, under the style and title of—'Shreemunt Majorj Shaje Rajah Chutterputty, of Sattara.'

"Bala Sahib, a member of the Royal Family, and about twenty adherents followed the palankeens of the dethroned prince from Sattara. The present Rajah has no children, and is not to be permitted to adopt, so that the Sattara territory will, at his death, be annexed to the dominions of the East India Company.

"We are glad to be able to state in correction of a passage, which occurred in our account of the 4th inst. that although the Rajah was told the British Government was fully satisfied, that his guilt had been conclusively established, he was not required to make any acknowledgment of his criminality. This measure would have been harsh: it might have clouded the otherwise unsullied justice of the cause, and afforded to generous minds a justification of the Rajah's resistance."

EARTHQUAKES IN SCOTLAND.

Shocks of earthquakes had been felt in various parts of Scotland. They had been felt in Fife, Perthshire, Alloway, and various other sections of that country. We annex one of the many paragraphs, with which the papers before us abound upon the subject:

Dollar, 24th Oct.—The earthquakes that have of late been agitating the south western parts of Perthshire have been extending their alarming vibrations to our Arcadian vale. Since Saturday the 12th current, repeated shocks, contemporaneous, I believe, with those at Comrie, have been felt, not only in the valley, but along the southern acclivities of the Ochill Hills. These mountain masses, that form the northern barrier of the vale of the Devon, seem to be light as a feather to the immense subterranean lever that makes them simultaneously quiver throughout all their vast extent. The most violent shocks we have here experienced took place on Wednesday, the 16th, at half past two in the morning, and last night, (that of Wednesday, the 23d,) at a quarter past ten o'clock. This last shock was the severest and most alarming shock of all. Families were put into confusion by it, and some left their homes in alarm. Sleep was banished for the night. To the writer of this account, the sensation seemed as if two strong impulses upward—the second close following upon, but stronger than the first—were given to the ground, causing it to bound upward. The house seemed to reel, like a vessel mounting a lofty surge coming suddenly upon it. Half an hour afterwards a slighter shock was experienced.

It is to be remarked, that the weather, during the more violent shocks of the 16th and 23d, was very warm for the season, with a languid, still, dripping atmosphere, the clouds quite motionless, and not a breath of wind stirring, and it deserves no less to be noticed, that, previous to last night's shock, the barometer continued gradually rising, notwithstanding the continued rain last night, during the time of the shock, it stood at 29,70. This morning, though the rain still continues, it stands at 29,83; thermometer, 50 and 48. There has been no instance of earthquake in Clackmannanshire, I believe, since the 7th day of September, 1801, which was felt through all the central shires of Scotland. But that season was a dry clear pleasant one, with little rain; this season, on the contrary, has been remarkably cloudy and rainy—no less than 12¼ inches of rain having fallen here since the 1st of September.

ATTACK UPON LOUIS PHILIPPE.

An attack was made upon the King of the French, on the 26th ult. by a maniac named Stephanie Girault, who threw a stone into the royal carriage, and was immediately apprehended.

AN IMPORTANT CONCESSION.

Mr. Wheaton, agent of the United States, has obtained an important concession from the Congress of German Customs. They have granted a reduction of duty on the principal article of import from the United States—which we naturally conclude to be cotton.

RUSSIA AND CIRCASSIA.

The war in Circassia appears to be going on gloriously for the cause of freedom, the Russians having been defeated in an action with the loss of 12,000 men. The address of the Emperor Nicholas to General Grabbe, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Caucasus, "confesses," as the Commerce, a French journal, observes, "a struggle much more animated than the Russian Government desired up to the present time to avow." The same paper publishes a letter dated St. Petersburg the 12th ult. which states that the same General Grabbe, having besieged the Circassian fortress of Akusko for three months, at length ordered up from the Black Sea the 20th and 21st division of infantry, a large body of cavalry, and four batteries of artillery, and with them assaulted the place. The besieged made a most gallant defence, and repulsed the assailants four times.

Ultimately, however, General Galafficiel, at the head of the 20th division, penetrated by a breach into the town; a dreadful conflict ensued which continued until between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, when, feeling themselves overmatched the heroic remains of the garrison evacuated the town under the cover of the darkness leaving behind them of their number 502 dead and 122 wounded the principal part of whom were recognised as deserters from the Russian army. The loss of the Russians amounted to 5850 men killed and wounded. Just at the moment when the Russians entered the fortress of Akulko, Schamadi, the chief of the Circassian tribe of Tschetschentses, arrived to the relief of the place, but being too late for that object, he threw himself on the Russian cavalry, overthrew them, and took from them twelve field pieces, which, however, after spiking them, he was obliged to abandon. The total loss of the Russians was not less than 12,000 men. It would be therefore impossible for them to resume warlike operations before the arrival of reinforcements.

Algiers and Constantine.—The duke of Orleans had been received at Constantine, in October, with the greatest respect, by the native chiefs. They gave him a grand banquet, paid for by the duke. The cooks of the Scheiks prepared 144 different dishes, in their oriental style.—Among them we find "masked spinach, French beans a la rose, viands au jasmin." The Duke conferred several crosses on the chiefs, and gave them presents to the value of 4000l. He is preparing a great expedition to the Marabout, near where Gen. Salomon, Governor of Bougea, was killed, and whose death he is determined to avenge. Great mortality prevailed, however, among the French troops. The sick were being sent by steamers to Algiers.

The Dutch Loan to the Bank.—The London Courier of a late date says:—

The Dutch papers mention, that his Majesty has given an authorisation to Messrs. Hope & Co. of Amsterdam, to open a loan, on account of the Bank of the United States, for 10,000,000 guilders, in 10,000 bonds of 1000 guilders, each bond to be provided with ten half yearly coupons. Mr. Jaudon will be in Amsterdam in the course of to-morrow, so that we expect to be soon enabled to give the terms on which this transaction will be completed, the amount of which may be stated at 800,000l.

The Harvests.—It is conceded that the harvest in Great Britain, Egypt, Spain and the United States, has been abundant; but in Turkey and Russia, a failure, so much so, that wheat will have to be exported to Riga, Odessa, and Constantinople.

China.—The news from China is later and interesting. Mr. Elliott, the agent, still persisted in thwarting the views of the Chinese government. He accuses them of having been illicitly conversed with the Hong merchants in the very contraband trade of opium which they have denounced. The American ships do not appear to be interfered with, and serve now as a medium through which the merchandise of British vessels arrived out is sent by transhipment into Canton.

France.—In France, the prices of grain are still high—many of the joint stock companies have failed.

Gleanings from Foreign Papers.

A story of the death of Lord Brougham, had produced quite a sensation in London; but it was soon found to be a hoax.

Bulwer's new play had been produced at the Haymarket Theatre, and with decided success. Macready sustained the principal part.

Parliament had been further prorogued to the 24th of December.

Lady Bulwer has published a letter in one of the London papers over her own signature, in relation to the domestic difficulties between herself and her husband.

The Queen and Prince Albert Cobourg are constantly together and little doubt was entertained of a matrimonial arrangement between them.

Sheridan Knowles had a new play nearly in readiness, in which Miss Ellen Tree was to enact the principal character.

The Duke of Bedford is no more.

Paganini was still alive, but in very feeble health.

The negotiation between the Hopes and Mr. Jaudon was about to be renewed.

Mr. D. W. Harvey is appointed Commissioner of Police of London, He will therefore vacate his seat for Southwark.

The Empress of Russia was dangerously ill.

An opulent banker, says a Paris paper, "came unexpectedly, a short time back, into a fortune of nearly 10,000,000f. He immediately gave 800,000f. to each of his five brothers and sisters, and has since offered his hand, with the remaining 4,000,000f. to a young orphan lady."

He didn't invent that waistcoat.—The celebrated Beau Brummel is confined in a Lunatic Asylum.

Legislative Procrastination.—The French Chambers, it is believed, will not meet before the 15th of December.

The effect of London Fogs.—The suicides in London, are said to average one per day.

Love on the Stage.—Sheridan Knowles's new play is called "Love."

What it cost, and what it came to.—The cost of the Railway between London and Birmingham, was nearly £5,000,000 sterling. The estimate was only £2,750,000.

Hunt-ing a Drama.—Leigh Hunt has written a play for Covent Garden Theatre.

The Head and the Stomach at War.—At Madrid, a struggle is going on between the moderate and ultra Liberals, which tends to keep up the hopes of Don Carlos and his party.

From the Saturday Courier.—Communicated.

Gentlemen—I felt much gratified in seeing, by an advertisement in your paper of last Saturday, that the author of the Domestic Medical work, entitled, "Suggestions to Parents and Others," has determined to enlarge the work, publishing two or three additional numbers.

I am not acquainted with the author or his practice, except in a few cases, in the immediate vicinity of my residence, near Vine and Third streets, nor do I feel at liberty to insert his name in this communication, as I am informed that he is averse to any thing in the form of puffing, having refused to admit the friends of some of the individuals who have been restored to health by the means recommended in his work, to publish an account of it in the papers. Notwithstanding, I will take the liberty of recommending the work to the public, as I consider it of the greatest utility, and as it would otherwise require a long time to become generally known.

I have seen a gentleman, a respected artist in this city, Mr. Chas. Cohill, No. 175 N. Second street, (whose case, I am told, you are familiar with,) restored to health by the remedies recommended in the above-mentioned work, after having been afflicted with disease of the spine seven years, to such a degree, as to be unable to walk across his chamber without assistance, and had actually lost seven inches in stature, without being bent or disfigured in any other way.

I have seen a young and beautiful lady (whose name I am not at liberty to mention) restored to health, after having been afflicted with epilepsy seven years, and had a fit every two or three weeks during the time. She lives in my immediate vicinity.

I have seen a highly respectable aged lady, who had been insane a long time, and considered incurable by our best physicians, restored to her senses in a short time.

I have also seen a young lady, who had been supposed to be laboring under consumption of the lungs 3 years, restored to health, after having been told by Dr. C*, of Walnut street, that she could not live more than three weeks longer. It is now about three years since, and she has been entirely free from any symptom of Consumption.

I have seen a Mr. Johnston, No. 244 North Second street, who had been afflicted ten years with disease of the liver, and had been confined to his bed the principal part of the time, restored to such a degree of health in a short time, as to be able to support his family. He had been told by his physicians that he could not be cured, unless he would suffer his side to be opened, and the diseased part of the liver removed; and they imagined him too far gone, to be able to endure the operation.

I have likewise seen several persons, who had been supposed by their physicians to have disease of the heart for years, and were expected to die suddenly; cured in a short time.

Gentlemen, if you think these facts of sufficient importance to claim a place in your valuable paper, in the way of recommending the above-named work to the public, I feel confident that you will confer a favor on many of your readers. I would also remark, that the extract which was made from the work, and the plate exhibiting the spinal marrow and nerves in a diseased condition, published in your paper about a year since, has been of more use to the public, than any discovery of the same nature, which has been made during the last forty years. I have heard a great number of our most respectable physicians speak of its importance, and have heard of hundreds of individuals who have employed the remedies recommended in the work, and been restored.

In short, I consider the public indebted to the author for his labor and expense, in laying before it a work of so much utility, and in so plain a manner, as to enable the most illiterate to apply the remedies with success. It is also calculated to raise the medical profession from the degradation into which it has been cast by impostors and quacks; it will enable persons who peruse it, to distinguish between a physician and a mere pretender. I have long been desirous that some means should be devised by which those distressing nervous affections, that render so many unfit for the duties of life, might be removed. The great success which has attended the author's practice, may in part be attributed to his thorough knowledge of the nervous system. All the individuals mentioned above had been attended, and given over as incurable, by our most respectable physicians.

I feel satisfaction in stating that the author, comparatively speaking, is a young man, a native of the South, and a graduate of one of the Medical Colleges of this city; and, I am informed, he is entirely free from the devices that too often disgrace our profession. His work is conducted upon the most orthodox principles, and his quotations are from the very best authors extant, and fully prove the cases in point. I have not heard of a respectable physician in this city, who has not recommended it to families.

An Aged Physician.

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Published every Saturday, by

DU SOLLE & GRAHAM,

No. 36 Carter's Alley.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, &C.

$3 per annum—$2 if paid in advance; $1,25 in advance for six months.

Postmasters are requested to frank their letters addressed to us. The word "free" of itself is not a frank.

Agents will please endorse their letters with their names or initials.

Other letters will not be taken from the Post office unless the postage is paid.

Papers discontinued only at the end of the current half year's subscription, and then only at the option of the Publisher if arrearages are due.

Small Bank Notes of solvent Banks received in payment for our bills.

Agents are earnestly solicited to make quick remittances, without which it is difficult to keep accounts correct. They should always give names and time paid for.

Any person forwarding Ten Dollars current, free of postage, in advance, will be entitled to six copies.

Removals must always state the Post-office removed from, as well as to which the paper is to be addressed.

☞ To Advertisers.—Several advertisements have necessarily been set out this week, in order to enable us to effect our new arrangement. The loss will be more than compensated, by their appearance next week in a new and shining dress.

Jayne's Hair Tonic.—This late discovery of Dr. Jayne awakens the praises of the press in all parts of the country. The fact is the more the article becomes known the less peace has the Doctor. A continual stream of bald heads keeps pouring into his establishment, who go to bed at night, dream of long and flowing locks, and awake in the morning and find the vision realised. We saw a bewitching damsel a few days since, the curl of whose auburn locks attracted our attention, and for some time we did not recognise an old friend. "Bless us, Maria," said we, "where did you raise that beautiful hair?" "Thank you, sir," said the blushing girl, "but you must ask Doctor Jayne." The fact is, that although the Doctor is verging into the "sear and yellow leaf" of life, he understands how to please the ladies.

REVIEW OF THE MARKET, FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 29, 1839.

Remarks—The market has been exceedingly dull during the past week, and transactions becoming daily more limited, as the season in which business here comes almost to a stand approaches more nearly.

Bark—Quercitron has declined since our last, and sales have been made at $43, at which price the market closed heavy. We hear of no sales of tanner's except a small lot of Peach Oak, partly damaged, at $6.

Coffee—The operations are very limited and in small lots. We hear of sales of 142 bags St. Jago at 10½ a 10¾c, 4 months, and 300 Rio at 11 a 12¾c.

Fish—There is nothing doing in mackerel—stock light. No demand and prices nominal.

Flour and Meal—The operations in Flour since our last reach to about 5000 barrels, principally at $6 25. A small sale was made in the early part of the week at $6 37½, and small lots of choice family brands continue to command that price. Nearly all sold was for export to the West Indies and South America. We quote $6 25 as the price of the day. Stock continues light. Rye Flour is scarce and in demand at $4 25. Corn Meal in barrels may be quoted at $4 25 for Brandywine, and $4 for other, in hhds at $18 for Brandywine, and $17 for other.

Grain.—The receipts of Wheat are light and sales have been limited at $1 20 for Southern. We hear of sales of Pennsylvania Red in Broad street at $1 19. Corn has submitted to a further decline. Sales of Old Yellow at 65a66, and of new at 50a56. Sales of Rye afloat at 70c; in store it is held at 72a75c. Oats—Sales at 31c.

Hides—The stock in first hands is light and confined to a parcel of Laguayras.

Molasses—Sales by retail amounting to 70 hhds. Cuba at 30c. 4 and 6 months from the first hands.

Naval Stores—Are without any change in price, with a very limited demand.

Oils—Are dull and confined to retail sales, at former prices.

Provisions—We have no change to note. Stock of Pork and Bacon both light, but demand limited, more especially for the latter.

Rice—Sales at 4¼.

Sugars—No change to note in prices, though the market is dull; operations limited almost entirely to box sugars. We hear of sales of 70 boxes brown Trinidads at 8 1-16 to 8¼c. 100 white do. at 10c.; 80 hhds. and 230 brls Cuba on terms unknown; 117 boxes, 70 brls. Brown St. Jago's at 7½; 165 boxes brown Havannas at 7¼.

Tobacco—No variation in former prices, at which there have been some sales.

Cattle market.—Beeves—The arrivals at John's Union Drove Yard, Ridge Road, for Monday's market, were 75 head, and for yesterday's 432. The sales were very dull, and ranged from $6 to $8.

Cows and Calves—The arrivals at Thompson's Yard, Callowhill street, amounted to 100 head, which were nearly all disposed of at from $23 to $48.

Hogs—About 400 head at Thompson's Yard, which were sold with the exception of 70 head, at from $6 to $7 per cwt.

Sheep—were abundant, and sold as low as $1 per head for common, to $3 50 for best.

Hay and Straw Market.—Hay and Straw remain about the same as last week—the former good Timothy at $16 per ton.—North American.

Saturday Evening Post.

Prospectus of a New Volume.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST having CHANGED PROPRIETORS, the paper will be brought out early in December in

An entirely new Dress.

A Series of Improvements

are contemplated, which will place THE SATURDAY EVENING POST in the front rank of the best news and literary journals in the land.

It is the design of the proprietors to spare no pains or expense to make the paper

All that can be Desired.

The type, which is now casting for us, and which will be ready early in December, is of an unique, eminently handsome, and very superior quality. A new "head" for the paper is also being engraved for us, by a celebrated Artist, combining beauty and simplicity, with utility and taste. We have, besides, made arrangements for a regular and adequate supply of stout, white paper, at considerable expense. In addition to these efforts toward perfection in the mechanical department, and exterior of our paper, no labor, and no cost will be spared in the development of its intellectual strength. Our own exertions, when once fairly started, shall be of no ordinary character, and we have secured the assistance of

SEVERAL VALUABLE LITERARY FRIENDS,

well known among the coteries of science, romance, and philosophy. In short

THE PAPER ITSELF

shall be the

Great Inducement to Subscribers.

As we intend wholly to discard the policy of purchasing subscribers by subsidy, WE SHALL MAKE THE PAPER FULLY WORTH A SUBSCRIBER'S MONEY.

In order to gratify, as much as possible, the laudable desire of our country readers, a large portion of our attention will be devoted to the collection and diffusion of such as may seem IMPORTANT TO AGRICULTURISTS, and the population resident without the confines of our great cities. We shall carefully chronicle, not only the phenomena of men, but of things; not only the fluctuating value of opinions and hypothesis, but (a far more important matter) of beef, pork, flour, corn, oats, potatoes, etc. etc. as well as of every thing else calculated to interest the head, the stomach, or the pocket, of every member of society.

News, Memoranda, Tables, Facts, Hints, &c.

In fine, we are determined to make THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, PRE-EMINENTLY

A Family Newspaper.

A sheet, which the most modest may peruse without a blush, the most innocent without contamination, the most susceptible, without the apprehension of an ill; a sheet, which of a long winter's eve, the whole household may listen to, while seated around the cheerful hearth, confident of amusement and instruction, and in anticipation of the joyous laugh, the witty thought, and the profound reflection.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST is so old and well established a newspaper, and circulates so widely among the steady, reading portion of the community, that we enter upon our labors with full confidence of the future.

TERMS—$2 in advance, $3 at the end of the year. No new subscriber received without the money or a responsible name. The same agents as heretofore will act for the paper.

All communications to be addressed, post paid, to

DU SOLLE & GRAHAM,

Editors with whom we exchange will much oblige us by giving the above a few insertions.

HUNT'S MERCHANTS' MAGAZINE, AND COMMERCIAL REVIEW. Published monthly by Freeman Hunt, 142 Fulton street, New York, and J. W. Scammell, 47 Arcade, Philadelphia, at FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

This periodical is devoted exclusively to the interests and wants of the business community, and in this respect differs in its character from any magazine either in this country or Europe. It is intended to be literally and truly a useful work.

Its contents embrace every subject connected with commerce and political economy. Biographical sketches of eminent merchants, and essays from the ablest pens, on banking, navigation, manufactures, insurance, trade and commerce, mercantile law; including important decisions in the different courts in the United States and England, form part of the contents of each number; together with official reports of all new commercial regulations and treaties.

The Merchants' Magazine is also the repository for authentic statistical information of foreign and domestic trade and commerce, banking, etc. collected from official sources, and classified in tables, valuable for present and future reference.

TESTIMONIALS OF THE PUBLIC PRESS.

It deals in facts rather than fiction. The articles are marked by good sense and sound information. Every merchant in the land should take a pride and feel pleasure in sustaining this magazine.—Phil. Inquirer.

If merit is any criterion of success, sure are we that Hunt's Merchants' Magazine will go on prospering and to prosper. What Blackwood is in Conservatism, Hunt bids fair to become in Commerce.—Montreal Herald.

We earnestly commend this important magazine to our merchants as being a cyclopedia of most valuable information upon every subject connected with mercantile affairs.—Boston Times.

A very careful examination warrants us in speaking in the highest terms of the character of the articles, and the ability displayed in this periodical.—Phil. Courier.

Each number of this Magazine should be in the counting room of every merchant and business man in the country.—Atlas, New York.

We risk no contradiction in saying that it is a magazine which every merchant will find not only useful, but absolutely necessary, to his daily wants.—N. Y. Gazette.

To the general reader, the Merchants' Magazine must be highly entertaining, and to the merchant, invaluable.—N. Y. Mirror.

The rank which this periodical has already taken, is second to none, either in this country or Europe.—Sunday Morning News.

It is an elegant periodical, got up in the most finished style of modern elegance, and well filled with agreeable and valuable matter of the highest importance to the mercantile community.—Phil. Chronicle.

This work is replete with every species of useful information to the merchant, trader, and broker, and cannot, we think, fail to be liberally encouraged.—Mobilean.

This is beyond all question the most useful magazine issued from the American press.—American Traveller.

If it meets with its deserts it will be liberally supported.—Eastern Argus (Portland.)

We take great pleasure in commending in the strongest terms, a work of such sterling merit.—Boston Herald.

PUBLIC SALE.—Pursuant to an order of the Orphans' Court of Chester county, will be sold at public sale, on SATURDAY, the 7th December, at one o'clock, P. M. on the premises, all that valuable FARM, late of Waldron Cheney, deceased, situate in Uwchlan township, in the county aforesaid, within one mile of Lionville, and three miles from the Columbia Rail-road, (at the Woodlands,) five miles from Downington, and about twenty seven miles from Philadelphia—containing 135 acres and some perches, of which about thirty acres are Woodland, and the remainder arable, in a good state of cultivation, having all been recently limed, and is divided into convenient fields, with good fences.

The improvements are a large and well finished DWELLING HOUSE, of stone, nearly new; good stone barn, wagon-house, spring house, over a never-failing spring; shops, ice-house, &c.; an excellent orchard of apple and other fruit trees.

This property is well worthy the attention of persons wishing to purchase a well improved Farm, in a pleasant neighborhood, near the public improvements, and within a few hours ride of Philadelphia.

nov 30—1t THOMAS LEWIS, Administrator.

THE WEEKLY LEDGER—Is a newspaper of large size, stored with choice articles, condensed and clipped of all redundancy of expression, in order to present the greatest amount of information in the fewest words. Every late item of news foreign and domestic; occurrences of general interest; legislative proceedings; reports of trials; remarkable police cases; observations on matters and things; exposures of humbug, quackery, and imposition, of every kind; scientific intelligence; new inventions, discoveries and improvements in the arts; agricultural essays, and remarks on the management of farms, stock, gardens, dairies, &c. (under this head, much rare and important information respecting the cultivation of the morus multicaulis, Rohan Potato and sugar-beet,) literary and miscellaneous articles, such as tales, poetry, &c.—These, with every thing else that a newspaper should have, will be constantly found in the Weekly Ledger. The popularity and success of our daily paper are almost unequalled in this country; and it is merely necessary that the attractions of the Weekly should be generally known to make it equally popular and successful. The circulation is already very extensive and is rapidly increasing.

Terms.—$2 per annum, or $1,25 for six months, payable in advance, invariably.

Saturday Evening Post, and in his recent report of Fashions, a complimentary certificate, signed by "nine tailors and one case," the concluding paragraph of which is as follows:

"And we conclude by saying that there remains not one iota of doubt in our minds but that Allen Ward deserves the credit of the originality of the Protractor System, and ought not to be plundered of its emoluments; and also believe that he has done more toward the improvement of the trade than any other reporter."

And appended thereto is the signature of W. Fairchild, Martin Mathers & Co. "J. Tittle & Son," Hubbard & Baker, Alexander & Lindsey, H. Rigby, E. Harrington, G. D. Chabot, J. Merchant, and Wm. Rea.

Now what will be thought of that man so utterly regardless of probity and truth, nay, even of that cautious admonition which governs the discreet rogue, and causes him "to assume a virtue though he hath it not," to use the names of nine respectable tailors without their consent. Nine of the ten whose names are appended, most positively deny having signed such a paper, and four under their proper sign manual, disclaim having given any certificate at all.

Baltimore, November 16, 1839.

Mr. F. Mahan,—

Sir—Having our attention directed by you to a letter published by A. & A. F. Ward, Basford & Co. of Philadelphia, in their Fall Reports of Fashions. We hereby certify that to the best of our knowledge and belief, we have never signed any paper for them, and particularly the one in question.

Respectfully yours,
[Signed.] HUBBARD & BAKER,
J. MERCHANT,
W. REA,
ALEXANDER & LINDSEY.

Now it occurs to me that Allen, the poet, must be put to it, when he adds to his catalogue of offences one of such magnitude. We blush to give to his offence its legal name. We would apply a milder term, yet we know of none.

For once, the poet has invoked the NINE, and they would not stay invoked.

As Allen Ward pretends that he has accepted my challenge to a trial of skill in the art of Garment Cutting, I feel anxious to know whether he has yet found a Master Tailor to act as an umpire, and if so, will he please give his name and residence. My umpire is well known to Mr. Ward, and I feel impatient to have the question decided, as the challenge has been offered more than a year.

N. B. Messrs. A. & A. F. Ward, Basford & Co. will please return (through me) the old plates they borrowed from Messrs. Hass & Brothers, of Baltimore. I mean the plates from which they copied their Fall Plate of Fashions, as I have been authorised to demand them by the above named firm.

VALUABLE REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC SALE.—Pursuant to the last will and testament of Col. John Harris, late of Willistown township, Chester county, deceased, will be sold at public sale, on the premises, on third day, the 10th of December next, the following valuable real estate:

No. 1. A farm of one hundred ACRES be the same more or less, of excellent land, situate in the township of Willistown, aforesaid, (being the residence of said deceased,) in a good state of cultivation, tolerably well watered, under good fence, with a suitable proportion of WOODLAND, orchard, and meadow, adjoining lands of William Evans, Jeffrey Smedley, and others. The improvements are a good, large, comfortable two story STONE HOUSE, with a well of excellent water, and a pump at the door; a stone barn, a large stone wagon house, two stone spring houses, with out buildings.

This farm is handsomely located, seventeen miles from Philadelphia, and eight miles from West Chester, on a public road leading from Shugartown to the Leopard Inn, in an excellent neighborhood, convenient to mills, schools, and places of public worship; it is well calculated for a grain growing, grazing, or dairy farm, and surpassed by few in the county, for productiveness. Persons wishing to view previous to the day of sale, will please call on Emanuel Gill, residing on the premises, or on either of the subscribers.

Sale to commence at two o'clock, P. M. on said day, when conditions will be made known by the Executors.

Also, Will be exposed at public sale, on the premises, on 5th day, the 12th day of December next, at two o'clock, P. M. FARM No. 2. containing about ninety-seven ACRES of good land, situate in the township of Pikeland, county of Chester, in a good state of cultivation, well watered, and divided into convenient fields, having a fair proportion of woodland, orchard, and meadow, adjoining lands late of Michael Shoneater, John Moore, and others. The improvements are a good, substantial, recently built, two story STONE DWELLING HOUSE, with two rooms on the first, and three on the second floor; a well of good water with a pump near the door; a large well finished stone Switzer barn and wagon house, a very neat tenant house, and spring house. Said farm is handsomely situated, a public road leading from West Chester to the Yellow Springs runs through the premises; being about ten miles north of the former, and an half mile south of the latter place, and twenty-five from Philadelphia, in a good neighborhood, convenient to mills, schools, and places of public worship of different denominations.

Also, Will (on the same day as the last mentioned tract, and immediately thereafter the same,) be sold at public sale, tract No. 3, containing eighteen ACRES and some perches of land, adjoining No. 2, together with a large stone grist mill erected thereon, in a good state of repair, having two run of stones, on a branch of the Pickering creek, commanding twenty-five feet head and fall, with a substantially built dam, furnishing a full supply of water for a good business the driest seasons, a comfortable stone dwelling house, stone smith's shop, stone spring house, one log and one frame stable. A part of this tract is under timber, some of it is arable and some meadow land.

Also, Will be exposed at public sale, on the same day, at farm No. 2, and immediately after the same, two lots of chesnut timbered land, on the Valley Hill, about two miles from said farm (No. 2,)—one of the said lots containing two acres, and the other three acres, of different periods of cutting. Persons wishing to view either the farm, the mill, or the chesnut lots, will please call on Thomas Harris, residing on No. 2, who will show the same, or on either of the subscribers who will give such other information as may be requisite.

Attendance will be given and conditions made known, at the time of sales, respectively by

A HINT TO TAILORS.—It is a well known fact that a majority of the handsomest fitting coats which we now meet with on promenades and at parties of pleasure, owe their graceful proportions to the improvements brought about by Ward's scientific principles of Garment Cutting. Those Tailors who subscribe to the improvements in cutting, published by A. & A. F. Ward, Basford & Co. seem to possess a striking advantage over some, whose prejudice or avarice deprive them of the advantages of the work.

PROGRESS OF TAILORING. Extract from the Fall Report of Fashions. The advantages of the Protractor System and Proof Measures, as set forth in this work, are becoming more extensively known and appreciated by the influential and better informed part of the community of tailors, every where.

In addition to the numerous testimonial certificates, from individuals in favor of this work, over all others of the kind, we have recently been politely furnished with a letter of approval and recommendation, from the principal Master Tailors of the city of Baltimore, which we beg leave here to insert. It bespeaks the minds of honest candor and of gentlemanly gratitude toward one of their fellow laborers, whose race, in the course of nature, is drawing to a close, but not without success in the good cause of aiding to raise the once degraded calling of a tailor, to its now scientific and respectable standing among the mechanic arts.

With sentiments of gratitude, and high regard, we acknowledge the receipt of the following letter:

Baltimore, Md. October, 1839.

A Recommendation and approval by the master Tailors of the city of Baltimore, of the superiority of Ward's Protractor and Proof System in its present state of perfection, as taught us by Mr. Basford, of the firm of A. & A. F. Ward, Basford & Co. of Philadelphia, whose qualifications as a practical Tailor, and Teacher of Garment Cutting, is worthy the patronage of the trade.

We have practically examined it, and find the above system to be the masterpiece of skilful minds, every measure is mathematically and reasonably calculated to find each point with certainty and precision, for all forms and positions of men, as exemplified and made plain by diagrams of each fashionable garment, and upon the score of economy, we believe that it is the cheapest and most correct report of the prevailing fashions, by reason of the beneficial utility it embraces.

And we conclude by saying, that there remains not one iota of doubt in our minds, but that Allen Ward deserves the credit of originality of the Protractor System, and ought not to be plundered of its emoluments; and also believe that he has done more toward the improvement of the trade, than any other Reporter.

THE OLIO.

Variety's the Spice of Life, that gives it all its flavour.

Solution to the enigma in last week's paper.

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

For the Saturday Evening Post.

ENIGMA.

I am composed of fourteen letters.

My 6th 10th and 4th, is the name of an industrious insect.

My 1st 6th and 6th, is the name of a domestic animal.

My 10th, 9th, 12th and 14th, is the name of a river in Egypt.

My 4th, 9th, and 7th, is what none of us are free from.

My 11th, 9th, 12th, 13th, and 4th, a useful medicine.

My 12th, 14th, 7th, 6th, and 4th, is the name of a Cape on the North of Spain.

My 1st, 14th, 10th, and 9th, a small coin of the United States.

My 4th, 10th, 6th, 9th, and 7th, a distinguished country of Europe.

My 13th, 9th, 11th, and 7th, the subject of quadrupeds.

My 12th, 14th, 7th, 1st, 9th, and 10th, a useful instrument of drawing.

My 10th, 9th, and 7th, is a small but useful article.

My 5th, 9th, and 3d, a metal very much in use.

My 6th, 9d, and 10th, a boy's plaything.

My 1st, 11th, 6th, and 9th, is a useful part of a gentleman's dress.

My 6th, 12th, 13th, 13th, and 11th, a delicious fruit when ripe.

My 9th, 12th, 13th, 9th, 7th, 2d, 9th, and 4th, a flourishing State of the Union.

My 12th, 9th, 7th, and 14th, is the name of a valuable tree.

My 3th, 14th, and 6th, is a production of China.

And my whole is the name of a distinguished City of Europe. E. W. J.

An answer to the above enigma is requested.

Apologetic.—Landlady.—Will you take another cup of coffee, sir? It is not as good as I could wish, owing to the haste with which you wished it got ready.

Traveller.—Madam, there is no occasion for an apology; your coffee is most excellent—what there is of it.

The landlady colored. He immediately recollected himself, and added, "Pardon me, madam, I did not mean what I said. I meant to say, there is an abundance—such as it is."

Many amusing anecdotes are recorded of Sir S. Garth. On one occasion, when he met the members of the celebrated Kit-kat Club, he declared that he must soon be gone, having many patients to attend; but on some excellent wine being placed on the table, and the conversation becoming interested and animated, the doctor soon forgot his professional engagements. His friend Sir Richard Steel, however, thought it his duty to remind the doctor of his poor patients.—Garth immediately pulled out his list upon which were fifteen names. "It is no great matter whether I see them to-night or not," said he, "for nine of them have such bad constitutions, that all the physicians in the world can't save them; and the other six have such good constitutions that all the physicians in the world can't kill them."—Physic and Physicians.

CALCULATION.

Says Giles, "My wife and I are two,
Yet faith, I know not why, sir;"
Quoth Jack, "You're ten, if I speak true:
She's one, and you're a cypher."

Observe fair Julia, all in all,
Mild, beautiful, and young;
'Tis true—but then her mouth's so small,
It cannot hold her tongue?

Penn and Story.—William Penn and Thomas Story, travelling together in Virginia, were caught by a shower of rain, and unceremoniously sheltered themselves from it in a tobacco-house; the owner of which happening to be within it, accosted them with, "You have a great deal of impudence to trespass on my premises—you enter without leave—do you know who I am?" To which was answered, "No." "Why, then I would have you to know I am a justice of the peace." To which Thomas Story replied, "My friend here makes such things as thee—he is the governor of Pennsylvania." The great man quickly abated his haughtiness.

Bell ringing.—In a room full of ladies and gentlemen, a lady requested a gentleman, who was next to the fire-place, to ring the bell. "I never before," said the gentleman, "heard of acting a pun; for once I will try." So saying, he rose, pulled a gold ring from his finger, and deliberately put the ring on one of her fingers, saying, "It is with much pleasure, indeed that I obey your orders, and thus ring the belle."

To love should Beauty not submit,
In vain its power it tries,
Love has a dart, if Beauty fights,
And wings, if Beauty flies.

Paganini.—Having lost all his teeth the celebrated maestro eats with the greatest difficulty. At table his meat is minced for him, either by one of his neighbors or his servant: His days are passed entirely either in playing at billiards, or walking with a friend. He is much amused when reading the Charivari, but his gaiety soon passes off: and he then sinks into a state of depression, the result, no doubt, of his illness, and seeks for solitude. With his cap on his head, and his cane in his hand, he retires to the environs of the baths, and remains plunged in deep meditation, interrupted sometimes by sudden movements, as if he wished to shake off reflection; he then strikes the ground repeatedly with his feet, like a man who, on rising from his seat, is afraid that his legs will give way under the weight of his body. The paralysis with which he is affected, and particularly the organs of speech, makes him talk with great difficulty. When he wishes to speak he pinches his nose and puts his mouth to the ear of his auditor, in order that he may be heard without making too great an exertion of his feeble voice. Sometimes his voice is extinct, and then he sees signs with his fingers.

EPIGRAMS.

An epigram should never be extended to eight lines. Four lines ought to be the ne plus ultra—if only two, so much the better. Here is one uttered by an old gentleman, whose daughter Arabella importuned him for money:

"Dear Bell, to gain money, sure silence is best,
For dumb bells are fittest to open the chest."

Another, on a lady wearing the miniature of an unworthy person around her neck:

"What! hang from the neck of a lady?" cries Bill,
"Was ever such folly and impudence known?
As to hanging, indeed, he may hang where he will;
But as to the neck, let it be by his own."

Another by Dr. Jenner, sent with a couple of ducks to a patient:

"I've despatched, dear Madam, this scrap of a letter,
To say that Miss ——— is very much better,
A regular doctor no longer she lacks:
And therefore I've sent her a couple of quacks."

Another by a disconsolate husband upon the death of his wife:

"Two bones from my body have taken a trip,
I've buried my rib, and got rid of my Hyp."

And the other, by the friend of a gentleman who was expecting the decease of his:

"Brutus, unmoved, heard how his Portia fell,
Should Jack's wife die, he would behave as well."

A compliment.—A Frenchman who had learned English, wished to be particularly polite, and never neglected an opportunity of saying something pretty. One evening he observed to Lady R. whose dress was fawn-colored, and that of her daughter pink—"Milady, your daughter is the pink of beauty." "Ah, monsieur, you Frenchmen always flatter." "No, madam, I only do speak the truth, and what all the world will allow, that your daughter is the pink, and your ladyship the drab of fashion!"—It was with great difficulty the Frenchman could be made to comprehend his sottise.

That apt remarker, Dr. Franklin observed "the eyes of other people are the eyes that ruin us. If all but myself were blind, I should want neither fine clothes, fine horses, nor fine furniture."

The Desert.—European enterprise has rendered the desert quite a comfortable tract to pass over. In the overland route between England and India, there are two donkey lines, over the desert parts of the journey. A lady writes in the Bombay Courier:—"Nothing could be easier, nor more comfortable, than our passage across the desert; we made it in four days on the donkies, by stages of twenty miles, and found three or four small tents at each stage. The weather was intensely cold during the whole of the first three days, and we were glad of cloaks, blankets, &c. It seemed like a pic nic the first three days, and I found it more agreeable to cross the desert, than I ever found travelling in India. As to any difficulties, it is quite a farce to think of them." The Courier thinks that both lines will be fully supplied with business, by the great increase of travel. What would Abraham and Isaac have said to this?

Contented Poverty.—Do not sigh for this world's goods, nor lament thy poverty. Out of the meanest hovel thou canst get a sight of heaven.

Long time ago—
On the banks were grew the daisy,
Whiter than snow,
Lived a beaming, buxom lassie,
You won't so slow:
Oft she tripp'd the lea so grassy.
Long time ago.
Sobs and spoonback full of water,
Long time ago,
Praise and sighs and promises taught her
My love to know.
Oft did my fond fancy think her
Purer than snow:
But she ran off with a tinker!
Long time ago.

That looks easy—I'll try one. Here goes—Hem;

In Chesnut street, where walk'd the ladies,
Long time ago:
Waiters, dandies, nurses, babies
All in a row—
One night I saw a bounteous creature,
Walking so slow:
"They've torn away my darling lover,"
Then tears did flow.
I cry'd "my dearest, think not of it,
I'll be your beau!"
She turned her face—'twas black as sloe,
Long time ago —.
Those Bully, isn't I a whale—Little Gordon.

That's pretty good, but here goes for beating the original of Gen. Morris.

Near the lake where drooped the sumac,
Long time ago—
In the waves that never freeze,
Whether cold, or no.
A fishing sat a farmer's daughter
Who had'nt a beau;
Fished she did, more than she caught her.
Long time ago.
At the bait, I gave a nibble,
Long time ago:
Since I'm caught she's play'd do deid
Much to my woe:
Now she takes it in high dudgeon
If I do so—
And says she catched a scaly gudgeon
Long time ago.—Mercury.

DECLINE OF VEGETATION IN LAPLAND.

The London Athenæum for May 16, contains a letter from a correspondent in Sweden, who accompanied the French savans on their scientific tour to Lapland. He states some interesting facts relating to the change which had been effected in that climate within a few years. It has long been believed that vegetation in more northern parts of Lapland is constantly on the decline; and large tracts of land are found under the lee of the mountains, formerly covered with fir woods, where now only stumps and rotten roots of fir trees with a miserable birch are to be seen. But no where is this decline so perceptible as in the neighborhood of Kautokeino; where formerly, perhaps only a century ago, a forest of Scotch fir flourished the whole length of the Alten river, a distance of 72 miles, nothing is now to be seen but a few miserable mountain birch, which every year threatens to destroy. The writer adds, that on comparing this phenomenon with the experience of the successive decrease of the fir in Torneo Lapland it must be admitted as a fact, that vegetation is on the decline in the higher northern regions; and the question will then be, how this phenomenon can be accounted for? Is it to be attributed to local causes, or to the great increase of ice in the Polar regions? the cause of which must again be looked for in some great cosmographical change in the globe. If this decline of vegetation continues, the high northern regions will, in a few centuries, become uninhabitable, and the northern part of Norway will be in danger of being frozen up in the same way as history narrates of Greenland.

Slippery women.—The aborigines of Hayti believed that men were a long time destitute of women, but happening to wander near a small lake, they saw certain animals on the branches of the trees, which proved to be women. They attempted to catch them, but found it impossible to get any hold of them, as they were as slippery as eels. At last they employed a number of men whose hands had been rendered rough by a kind of leprosy, and who succeeded in catching four of them, from whom the world was peopled.

Fontenelle lived to be nearly one hundred years old. A lady of nearly equal age, said to him one day in a large company, "Monsieur, you and I stay here so long that I have a notion Death has forgotten us." "Speak as softly as you can, madam," replied Fontenelle, "lest you should remind him."

TRUE ELEGANCE.

The women of Spain and Spanish America are celebrated throughout the world for the elegance of their walking, and for the way in which they carry their veil or mantilla. Knowing it only from books, we cannot say precisely in what the beauty of their walk consists: but we take it for something between stateliness and vivacity—between a consciousness of their being admired, and that grace which is natural to any human being who is well made, till art or diffidence spoils it. It is perfection, we doubt not, of animal elegance. We have an English doubt, whether we should not require an addition or modification of something, not indeed diffident, but, perhaps, not quite so confident; something which, to the perfection of animal elegance, should add that of intellectual and moral refinement, and a security against the chances of coarseness and violence. But all these are matters of breeding and bringing up, or, of "birth, parentage, and education," and we should be grateful when we can get any one of them. Better have even a good walk than nothing, for there is some refinement in it, and moral refinement, too, though we may not always think the epithet very applicable to the possessors. Good walking and good dressing, truly so called, are alike valuable, only inasmuch as they afford some external evidence, however slight, of a disposition to orderliness and harmony within; of shapeliness and grace in the habitual movements of the soul.

AUTUMN.

The sear and yellow leaf reminds us that another autumn is at hand. There is no subject in nature more beautiful to the contemplative mind than autumn. When we go back in memory to the gay flowers of the vernal fields, the green foliage of the mountains, hills and valleys, and contemplate their beauty, their glory, their freshness, their grandeur and sublimity, we think of but youth and happiness. But when we see the ruddy hue of declining summer deepening into the rich robe of autumn—gathering like the pall of death upon all nature—we are reminded in her own emphatic language, that we, like the "leaves that fall in wintery weather," must ere long, as they are nipped by the autumnal frost, be cut down by the strong arm of death, and gathered to the tomb of silence. It is the time for the mother to visit the lonely grave of her departed love, and weep over it the bright tear of sorrow—for the friend, the acquaintance, and the relative—to think of those who have closed their eyes for ever upon the vanities of earth, and lie sleeping among the silent dead.

At such a period the mind enters into untold enjoyment. There is a sweetness even in the deepest melancholy, which flows to the heart, touching every tendril with emotions of affection, sympathy and love. It is the time to abstract our thoughts from things perishable—to turn from the ephemeral charms of earth, to the more sublime beauties which lie beyond the grave—to learn from the sober realities around us, that our days will have an autumn, that we cannot expect while here "one bright summer always," though we may look forward to a time when the bloom of an eternal spring will be known for ever;—where streams of happiness flow in tranquil beauty from a fountain which time cannot affect.—Baltimore Clipper.

THE LAKES.

Extract from a Traveller's letter in the Baltimore Patriot.

One morning's dawn found us in the midst of Lake Huron, with one wide expanse of water all around us, and to the (to me) novel situation of being entirely out of sight of land, and that too in fresh water. The lake was perfectly smooth and undisturbed, save by the ripples made by our boat, which chased each other in long and undulating lines as far as the eye could reach.—And here was exhibited a beautiful spectacle, which I never recollect to have seen before.—Having the sun directly astern of us, a clearly defined iris was formed on each side of our boat from the spray thrown up by the wheels, and for some time attended our progress. From the agitated surface of the water upon which it was cast, it was constantly flickering and changing, fading into nothingness almost before its image was clearly sketched out, only to be painted anew by the next dash of the spray, and thus continuing its momentary and fitful existence until the sun, from its increased altitude, failed any longer to smile it into being.

You can form no correct idea of the extent and magnificence of these noble lakes without seeing them and sailing over them. They occupy, it is true, a large space upon the map, but the imagination will not, without aid, expand itself to the reality. Their actual dimensions have not been ascertained with perfect accuracy, the books which I have seen differing widely in the estimates. Calculations have been made as to their depth, but these also vary. Superior, Michigan and Huron have been set down at an average of nine hundred feet; but this is thought by many to be too little; and, indeed, it must be difficult, if not impracticable, to come to a correct measurement; the reply made to my questions generally was, "there is no bottom to them, [illegible] one hundred and fifty thousand square miles, and they are said to contain nearly one-half of the fresh water on the surface of the earth. Surround these on every side with a country, unsurpassed in the fertility of its soil, in the variety of its productions, and in its mineral resources, and settle that country with an intelligent, enterprising and "go-ahead" population, and you may form some faint estimate of the elements which are at work to hurry on this favored region to future greatness and a glorious destiny.

A THEATRICAL STRIKE.

"Come in. What is it?"

"Can you see Mr. Fatten?"

"What Mr. Fatten?"

"The master of the supernumeraries."

"Send him in. Now, Mr. Fatten, what is the matter? Make haste, for I am busy."

"Sir, there's a strike with the children in the theatre."

"So there ought to be, Mr. Fatten, if you did your duty properly, and kept a birch rod."

"Yes, Sir; but all their fathers and mothers come on me, and threaten to punch my head; now you know it is not my fault."

"Well, what is this strike, as you call it?"

"The girls who are to fly in the new ballet won't have the wires affixed to them unless they are raised to eighteenpence a night; their mother's won't let them endanger their lives under that sum! Now, sir, we should be in a great scrape at night, if this were to happen; worse than they were in at the other house with the boys in the storm."

"What was that, Fatten?"

"Did'nt you hear of that, Sir? Oh, there were sixty boys, who stood on the stage under a very large canvass, painted to represent the sea. Now, these boys were placed alternately, and were to rise and fall, first gradually and then violently, to represent the motion of the waves in a storm; and in the first three nights of the piece it had a powerful effect; but, after that, the manager reduced the water rate, that is to say, he lowered the salary of each wave to sixpence per night. The boys took their place under the canvass sea; and when the prompter gave the signal for the storm, the water was stagnant—instead of the ship striking, it was the waves that struck. The Sub-manager, in a fury, enquired the cause; when the principal billow said, 'We won't raise a peg unless you pay us a shilling a-night, for it wears out our corderoys so.'"

"God, I think that must have been the deep, deep sea! Well, I promise the girls the eighteen-pence; but I will be even with them; I will keep them dangling in the sky-borders in a thorough draught all the night. Tell them so."—Earl Patten.

"THE SEA! THE SEA!"

The members of the United States army don't much seem to relish their hard duty. Lieut. Patten, in the last Knickerbocker, dates the following "Song of the Sea" from a swamp in Florida. He evidently prefers clear water to mud and water: in other words the Navy over the Army:

My home is on the heaving sea,
Beyond the breakers' roar,
And I never know a thought of woe,
Save when I see the shore;
My life is like a flashing oar,
And like a merry stave,
For I whirl along the deep, huzza!
And dance upon the wave!

Amid the calm, without a care,
For aught that earth can bring,
While rocking in the idle air,
I sit aloft and sing;
And when the storm booms fierce and far,
Regardless of the gale,
I climb the slippery shrouds, huzza!
And bend the bellying sail!

The woodland note is sweet to hear,
And soft the hum of hives;
But there's no music to my ear,
Like that which Ocean gives,
When first our barque, with every spar
"Taught strain'd" her flight to urge.
'Mid rattling tramp, and wild huzza,
Beats back the bristling surge!

They say the landsman's bosom thrills
With deeper joy than ours,
That glory crowns the sunset hills,
And fragrance scents the bowers:
But off! stretched seaward from the bar!
Spread out the canvass free!
And should they had, tramp back, "huzza!
Our home is on the sea!"

Once more upon the waters! yet once more!
And the waves bound beneath me as a steed
That knows his rider. Welcome to their roar!

THE STRANGE SAIL.

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio than are dreamt of in your philosophy!"

"Keep her to it, quarter master," shouted the first lieutenant, "hold on all for your lives."

Down it came. As if leaping from the pitchy darkness ahead, foaming, flashing, roaring in the awful tumult of the storm, the huge wave hurled its torrent of waters upon our bows, swept the decks, wrapped us in clouds of foam, and while every timber quivered like a reed whirled wildly away into the darkness astern. As it rushed hissing by, a lone, half-stifled shriek rose fearfully upon the gale, and then died away in the wailings of the hurricane.

"A man overboard!" rung across the decks. Never had I heard that cry at so awful a moment. It is at all times a thrilling thing, but never more so than in the darkness of the night and amid the howlings of the tempest. The strongest stands aghast, and the stoutest nerves shiver, as its notes of wild alarm rise over all the din of the hurricane. Never had I heard it without a cold sickness at the heart, as I thought of the poor wretch struggling in the waste of waters, and knew perhaps that no human power could save him from his terrible doom. At such times there is a deep horror falls upon the crew; and I have seen the noisiest deck hushed into silence at that ominous cry, rising over the deep tones of the tempest, peals out like a voice from the dead.

"A man overboard!" was echoed from fifty voices trembling with alarm.

"Cut away the life-buoy," thundered the officer of the deck springing upon a gun, and peering into the darkness astern as he held on by a rope, "stand by to lower away the lee-quarter boat,—quick, there my lads. Hillo!"

The men needed no incentive. The boatswain had scarcely piped her crew before they had rushed to their stations, and stood eagerly waiting the order to launch to certain death upon that stormy sea.

"Up with the rocket," and whiz it rushed on high.

"Hark! was that him?—hillo!" They listened, but no answer followed.

"Run up the signal lantern,—hillo!—hillo!

"Can you see him?"

"No."

"Can you hear any thing?"

"Nothing."

"Hillo!—hi-l-o!"

"Ahoy! -a-h-o-y!"

"Is the buoy in sight?"

"No, sir," was the mournful answer.

"Bring here that rocket."

The thin reed hissed on high, leaving its long train of light flashing in the gloom, and gracefully arching over against the pitchy sky, broke into a thousand shivering sparkles, and illuminated the horizon like a shower of falling stars, disclosing far down to leeward the life-buoy tossing wildly on the surge, or burying in the clouds of foam that swept swiftly by. All at once it heaved up against the dusky background, and for one breathless instant hung there in bold relief. A sound of thrilling suspense ensued, and every eye was strained to catch the figure of the lost seaman. With a deep breath the officer turned away. The man was not there.

"Belay all with that boat," suddenly broke forth, in the trumpet tones of the old commodore, "steady, quarter master, steady, HOLD ON ALL," and as another giant billow deluged our decks and swept hissing over us, the old man could be seen holding on near the gangway, his grey locks dripping with the brine as he ejaculated, "it's madness to try to rescue him;—God Almighty have mercy on his soul!"

The shock was so tremendous that the old ship reeled, and sinking heavily into the trough, seemed as though she would never emerge from the tons of water that had poured upon her decks. At last slowly and wearily she rose dripping from the deluge, and like one stunned rolled her vast yards heavily to windward.

"Keep a sharp look out there, forward, Mr. Danforth!"

"Ay, ay, sir," I shouted back.

I was standing on the forecastle partially sheltered by the bulwarks from the showers of spray that flew half mast high, as the frigate plunged and struggled against the head sea; and for near an hour I watched there on my lonely station, listening to the wild roarings of the hurricane as it rushed through the rattlins, or peering anxiously into the impenetrable gloom ahead. The shouts, the hurrying, the trampling of feet, and the bustle of the vain attempt to rescue the drowning man had long since subsided, and a deathly stillness hung over the almost deserted decks, broken only by the tread of one of the watch, or the low, plaintive wail of the passing tempest. The wind overhead was tearing by, moaning and shrieking through the rigging, as if a thousand unearthly beings mourned in the [illegible]. Around all was darkness. The huge foremast loomed itself in a blaze above, and the battle-lantern at my side threw its struggling beams a few feet faintly out and then spent them in a vain attempt to penetrate the thick gloom. In vain I strained my eyes into the obscurity ahead. Nothing could be seen but the white caps of the billows flashing in the gloom, or the dark shadow of some wave, larger than its fellows, heaved ominously up against the midnight sky. At times when the lightning streamed out, shooting the rushing waters with its pale, deathly light, a glimpse might be caught of the vast areas of agitated waves, tossing, roaring, foaming, and whirling along before the wind, now buried in clouds of flying spray, and now rearing their white heads up frightfully in the supernatural glare. But when the flash had subsided all became wrapt in deeper gloom than before, leaving a greenish hue tinging every thing around, and crowds of wild, mis-shapen figures flitting before your aching eyes. Strange, unearthly tones mingled in the tempest, and wild voices seemed to call and be answered in the gloom; now it was as if the cry of the drowned seaman was ringing in my ears, and now a hundred gibbering fiends echoed his despairing cry, or mocked him with unearthly laughter as they swept down on the wings of the gale. The hollow dash of the waters against the bows of the ship had a low and thrilling tone for the ear. Even the thrashing of the reef-points against the sail lent their strange music to the mysterious sounds around. Not a voice came up from the dark and seemingly deserted decks; the cries of the watch had ceased to break the supernatural silence with mortal sounds; the wild tones that rung around wailed more and more mournfully as the night advanced, and long before my watch was up I was awed, subdued, and thrilled by the strange feelings, almost approaching to superstition, at my heart.

Suddenly I felt a tap on my shoulder and old Taffrail stood beside me. He was a weather beaten tar, with the frost of sixty winters on his brow, and one who had served in the early navy of our country during her first struggle for independence. No man on board was more respected. He was on most points an oracle, few could splice a rope better, or sooner unhand a sail, or tell a tougher yarn under the bulwarks. His face was usually—rough and sunburnt as it was—lit up by a pleasant smile; but now there was something so singular about it as the dim light of the battle-lantern gleamed across its rugged front that I started involuntarily.

"An awful night, Mr. Danforth, the spirits of the storm are around, and the Lord Almighty is abroad in his majesty."

The deep, earnest solemnity of the old sailor, chimed in with my own thoughts, and I answered, "Yes, it is a fearful night. Many a poor fellow will say his last prayer before morning, and many a wife that is now sleeping sweetly will rise up a widow. The God of heaven, in his mercy, protect the widow and the fatherless."

"Amen!" said the deep, startling voice of the old seaman, as he bared his white locks to the tempest.

There was a pause of some minutes, during which my heart was too full of feelings of the deepest awe to speak. The old man seemed to be lost in the same sensations. At last he broke the silence, but in a low and solemn tone.

"Did you know Jack Danson, sir?"

"Was it Jack then that was lost?" said I in surprise, "poor fellow, he was as bold and gallant a lad as ever loosed a for-top-sail."

"You may well say that," answered the old man mournfully. "I've known him from a lad, and we've been messmates for the last ten years. By day and night, in storm or calm, with fair weather or foul, in battle or out of it, we've been always together, till I loved him as a son, and the lad, I believe sir," and here his rough voice grew thick, "loved me as his own father. We trod the same watch, and shared our mess together. I was once wrecked with him, sir, and we both lived for three days on a biscuit we broke between us. We've fought together, and when I was wounded he tended me like a nurse. He was such a hearty lad too, but he's gone—he's gone—young and active, and happy, the wide sea has swallowed him, while I am left here an old shattered hulk—why was n't it I?" and the old man paused, while his strong frame shook with emotion; but directly he continued, "he'd a sort of forboding, sir, of his fate. I tried to laugh it out of him no later than last night,—but the mark was upon him, his watch was up, his log was run out—did you ever lose a friend, Mr. Danforth?"

The question was put so unexpectedly, and contrasted so touchingly with the events of the evening and the awful scenes around, that it struck at once to my heart, and called up the memories of the early dead.

"I have, Taffrail," said I, grasping his horny hand. "God knows I've not forgotten how terrible a thing it is."

"I thought so," answered the aged seaman, "for you always seemed different from the other young gentlemen, as if you had a heart like, and could feel for a desolate old man."

"There is nothing like sorrow to teach us sympathy," said I,—"but this poor fellow, he had a mother and sister whom I understood he supported—what will become of them? alas!"

"They shall never want while I've a shot in the locker, or a timber of this old hull hangs together," fervently ejaculated the old man; and I fancied I felt a hot tear fall upon my hand, as he raised the cuff of his monkey jacket and hastily drew it across his eyes. "I once had a sister myself, sir, and I know how hard a time't would have been for her, had I left her penniless by death. She was a sweet and lovely being, sir, too pure, and holy, and heavenly for this sinful world of ours, and so her Father called her away to his bosom. She's been in the cold earth this forty years,—and since then I've never had one to love me till Jack and I met. I remember how I used to hear her afterward, in the still, lonely watches of the night, whispering to me in that voice, with which she would run weeping into my arms after a cruise. Many a long night, when no mortal ear was nigh, I've heard her in the low wind, or fancied I saw her pale, sweet face gliding by, in the moonlight, over the solitary seas. But it's all gone now, I've not heard it for years." He paused, and then added mournfully, "it's not often, sir, these old memories come across one, but at times they will tear up an old man's heart. Thank God, my time's nigh up, the old ship gets more rickety every day, the spars will by and bye go by the board, and then old Tom Taffrail will part his cable at last. It don't matter, when that day comes, whether the shell is launched from the grating, or follows poor Jack Danson over the beam."

For a moment neither of us spoke. The old seaman stopped under the pressure of his feelings, and I felt that sympathy would be best expressed in silence. I have heard it said that seamen are always thoughtless, and that sorrow never lies for a moment in their hardened bosoms, but, believe me, it is a libel on the best and noblest hearts that ever beat in a human breast! In the calm, in the storm, in the battle, in the revel, and by the dying couch, in every mood and condition of life, I have seen them, and ever found them the same. And now, as I stood there on that lonely forecastle, listening to the warm feelings, gushing from that old man's soul, I felt that forty years of toil and tempest had not frozen over the memories of his early days.

"I wonder if it's true, sir," said he in a calmer voice after a pause, "what they say about spirits visiting their old friends; I've always thought so, sir, and it's not agin reason, though it may be agin book-larning that the great creator suffers the dead to hold companionship with the living. I'm sure I've often heerd 'em in the night-watches. It's an awful storm abroad, sir, and there be strange voices on the gale, hark?—did you hear that, sir?" and the old man suddenly sank his voice to the lowest whisper, and clutched my arm eagerly, as a faint, but wild, unearthly cry seemed to shoot out of the gloom ahead, wail mournfully by us, and then die away to leeward in melancholy notes. I was not superstitious, but I have often seen sights to make me shiver; and now the old man's affrighted looks, the conversation of the last half hour, and the seemingly supernatural agencies in the winds around, contributed to fill me with an awe, as this strange wail once again went mourning by. As its last note sank away in the gloom astern, I almost fancied I distinguished the voice of the lost mariner, as when he swept by me with his dying shriek.

"Did you hear it then, sir?" gasped old Taffrail, "isn't his voice? The Lord help us from our sins!—I wonder if the dead sail, sir?—but look there—look there!" and he pointed with his quivering finger over the starboard bow, where a white object for an instant could be seen flitting along, and then as suddenly disappearing like a whiff of snow white smoke blown away by the winds; while the tempest howled wilder than ever around us, and a huge wave breaking over our bows, hurled its cold spray as high as the yard arm in showers above us. I was startled. I could not discredit our united eye-sight, and I believed it impossible for any ship to come in such frightful propinquity to us without running us aboard. I felt awed, chilled, bewildered. The darkness, meanwhile, was as impenetrable as ever, the lightning no longer streamed at intervals over the white waste, and we were laboring and straining in the vortex and quivering at every leap our maddened frigate took. Again the man clutched my arm convulsively, and I saw the white spectre looking sail open like a sea gull's wing in the gloom ahead, and then as instantaneously vanish, as though it were foam flung from some giant wave. It could not be a vessel,—the thought was madness. I had heard of wild stories and strange sights at sea, but here was one that taught me to laugh at a sailor's superstitions no more. Again it re-appeared as it shot across our forefoot, again the hardy old tar grasped me by the arm, and again that lone, startling, unearthly wail like a warning from the tomb.

"Ahoy, there," I shouted, struggling against the wild feelings that were stealing over me, and resolved to discover whether this strange visitant was of earthly kind or no, "ahoy, what sail is that close on the weather bow?"

My voice rang out sharply over the blackened waters, but though I listened for some moments not a sound could be heard in reply. The old man too stood by my side, reverently baring his grey hairs to the breeze, and gazing earnestly after the vanished apparition, as he leaned forward over the bulwarks with his hand to his ear to catch the slightest sound. None for a moment came. Then rose up again that supernatural cry, chilling the blood at my heart, and making my nerves shiver with strange affright as it went by on the rushing night breeze. At the same moment the mysterious sail opened a point more abeam, and flashing a second broadly in the darkness, died away again in the impenetrable gloom. I was perfectly amazed. I could not discredit the evidence of my senses, but my better reason struggled long against the conclusion they would lead me to. Let it be remembered that we were lying into the wind, and that the strange sail, if sail it was, had first appeared on the lee-bow and then shot directly across our track right into the wind's eye, and that, too, without seeming to lessen her distance from us,—a manœuvre, which the most inexperienced reader will see to be impossible for any vessel to accomplish. Yet, if eye-sight was to be credited, it had been done. The strange cry, too, established the presence of the singular visitant. What could I believe? The superstitions of the sailors were fresh in my mind, and as I turned toward the old man beside me, he ejaculated in a solemn tone.

"I'm thankful there's a God in heaven," "there's not mortal voices, nor are they sinless souls that sail that craft."

"By —— I impiously ejaculated, making a desperate effort to shake off my rising bewilderment and terror, "there goes the spectral sail again,—who's that craft, ahoy?—hail back or I'll fire?"

"Young man, take not the name of God in vain at this awful hour," said old Taffrail, with stern solemnity. I answered not, but springing to a musket, I fired a point abeam of where the apparition had last appeared. The same melancholy wail came back in reply, the wind tore crashingly by, seeming to join in the requiem, a hundred wild voices went past on the breeze, and over all, ringing fearfully in my ear, rose the death shriek of the lost foretop-man. I could stand no more, but staggering back, I fell senseless into the arms of the awe-struck old man.

The mind is a wonderful thing, and who shall penetrate its mysterious workings? At first I had been less startled by this strange appearance than old Taffrail, but as moment after moment, and trial after trial had added to my suspicions, until they amounted to absolute certainty, the control I possessed over my faculties gradually diminished, until when I uselessly fired at the spectral shadow and fell staggering back; my brain was in a whirl of contending bewilderment and madness. It passed off, however, almost as instantaneously as it had come on.

"Forward there—what's the matter to windward?" hailed the officer of the watch from the quarter deck.

I was just recovering, and the sound fell on me like one awaking from sleep. As the hail came struggling against the wind I made a desperate effort to arouse, and collecting my reeling faculties I shouted back,

"I thought—I saw—a sail, sir, nearly abeam."

"A sail!—has any one else seen it?"

"Yes, sir," said a look-out near the main. "I caught sight of it just as Mr. Danforth fired."

"Where did you first see it, Mr. Danforth?" said the officer of the deck.

"On the starboard bow—standing right across our track."

"It's but an illusion—Main there, did you see it too?"

"No, sir, but Tom Bates saw it,—and he says as how it's the Flying Dutchman," continued the look-out in a whisper.

"Silence!" thundered the officer of the deck, "and mind your eye to windward—" then turning to me asked, "how does it look ahead, Mr. Danforth?"

"Wild as a whirlpool and black as a wolf's mouth: the sky lifts a little now, sir, over the weather bow."

"Lifts!" said the old man, with thrilling emphasis, at my side. "Yes, sir, it's brightening right over where they disappeared. God preserve us! for there's a squall tearing down upon us like a whirlwind," and motioning across his body he pointed to a thin belt of light in the distant horizon, over the spot where the strange sail had just vanished. The vessel was no more to be seen. Had it been there we could not have missed it.

"We have seen that to-night to make us well nigh afeerd, Mr. Danforth,—we don't know what's on the seas, or who has commission to sail agin a hurricane like this. You hailed 'em, sir, and we're reaping it already,—look there!" he said in that low, solemn tone, that had already thrice thrilled me to the soul.

The words had scarcely left his mouth before the wind, which was a point or two on the weather bow, screamed out an instant in wilder agony, and then moaning sadly, died away, as if blown out; while a few moments of supernatural stillness ensued, during which the dark curtain of clouds abeam of us was suddenly lifted up and a spectral lightness flung over the stormy seas, disclosing the agitated vortex before and around us, and casting into bold relief the huge, dark billows that rose, like the bosom of a panting monster heaved against the sky. This second of boding stillness had scarcely passed, before a low wail rose and died away in the distance, as if it were the lamentation of some spirit of the storm; then came a melancholy moan, gradually deepening as it neared us, until it was lost in the wild roar of the hurricane, that rushing ruthlessly along, levelled the waves before its resistless fury, marking its track with a line of driving foam, and bursting at last upon the devoted ship abeam, tore, screamed and howled through the rigging, burying us to the lee scuppers, as it bowed our tall masts like willow wands to the water. I had but time to shout.

"Meet it with the helm, in with every rag, away there all," before the vast fabric was lying almost on her beam ends, while torrents of water poured over her sides and down into her waist. A minute more and she seemed settling forever: and wild cries rose up and rung along her decks as the startled crew, aroused from their hammocks, rushed tumultuously up the gangway, while the rapid orders of the quarter deck mingling with the roarings of the tempest and the shrill whistle of the boatswain's pipe produced a tumult, that seemed the forerunner of inevitable destruction. At last she seemed to heave a little, she rolled heavily from her prostrated situation, and was just beginning like a jaded courser to urge slowly ahead, when a crack louder than thunder was heard above, and the huge topsail torn from its fastenings and whipped into shreds, streamed out a moment from the mast and then went like a snow flake down the wind. The ship staggered, reeled and fell dead into the trough. A stifled shriek, as of a hundred men rose partially from the gale, but the stern discipline of a man-of-war forbid it to find full vent. I gave up all for lost.

"Hard up, quarter master, hard up!" thundered the old Commodore, making his appearance at this emergency. His voice filled us with hope and energy.

"Hard up it is," growled the veteran at the binnacle.

"Does she come round yet?"

"Not yet, sir,—she 's as dead as a log."

There was no chance for us unless to cut away our masts. It was a dreadful necessity, as it would force us to give up our cruize and disable us in case of emergency. But it was our only hope.

"Away there, boarders, with your axes—stand by to cut away the lanyards of the mizzen rigging," thundered the Commodore.

The men darted to their duty, each one holding by a rope as the seas poured in cataracts over our sides. A minute the old man paused before he gave the order to make a wreck of his darling frigate, and then came in a thick voice, full of pent up emotion, the loud command,

"Cut away there—sharp—sharper, my lads!" and we heard the dull strokes of the axes, the crack, the crash, and the mast with all it bore—its beautiful hamper went a wreck over our quarter.

It was an awful moment that ensued. The ship groaned audibly, and seemed powerless; she was apparently settling faster into the water than before; and six hundred men holding their breath in the agony of suspense, drew a long respiration and gave up all for lost. Meanwhile, the surges rolled over and into her, as if already revelling in their prey, and deluges of white frothy foam swept whirling along her decks. All felt that Life depended on that minute. Many a wild prayer rose up then, from lips that had not prayed for years, and many a poor father groaned as he thought of his distant little ones, and saw no hopes of his ever pressing them to his heart again. One,—two,—three seconds slowly crept by, a dead feeling of hopelessness came, crushing the hearts of all, when suddenly I felt the tempest shifting more aft, and at the same instant, the old Commodore at the binnacle, shouted clearly through the hurricane,

"She pays off—God Almighty be praised for His mercy!" and trembling irresolutely a second, her bows fell rapidly away, she whirled around on her heel, and gathering headway as the tempest struck her aft, rolled, struggled and plunged for a cable's length, and then drove like a race horse before the gale. Despite the discipline of the service, a wild shout of mingled thankfulness and joy roared from six hundred voices on that stormy sky.

"Clear away the wreck," thundered the Com- [illegible] sail and scud her till morning. Get her a little easy, but by all means tight, and then pipe all hands down again, for the poor fellows are worried and want rest. Ah! Mr. Danforth, is that you!" for my watch was just relieving, and I had come aft. "I've to thank you for the part you acted to-night; you first saw the squall coming up, and had all been as quick as you, we might have been saved this," and he pointed mournfully to the stump of the mizzen mast. "I knew your father, and a gallanter man never fought for his country. You're worthy to be his son. Had n't it been for you, tardily as they obeyed you, we should have been in eternity before now. God bless you, I envy you your dreams to-night," and the noble old man grasping my hand gave it a pressure that I shall never forget. With a tumult of various feelings I descended the gangway. The danger we had just escaped, the mysterious appearance of the preceding hour, and the coming of the squall out of the grave of the spectral sail, all lent their influence to thrill, stagger, and bewilder my mind, and sent me to my hammock in silent awe and gratitude. I tossed about for a few uneasy moments, but worn out nature at last triumphed, and I fell into the deep sleep of a tired seaman.

When morning dawned the gale was rapidly subsiding, but the long waves still rolled mountain high around, heaving their vast bulk away into the sky, and then sinking fearfully down into the abyss beneath us. As the day advanced the swell became longer, and the huge billows seemed to run a furlong in length, rolling their dark heads like [illegible] along, now crested with the white spray that glittered in the sunshine, and now sullenly raising their dark shadows in bold relief against the far-off heavens. Away in the distance the horizon was flecked with foam. A few light, fleecy clouds scudded across the sky, and a sea bird here and there could be seen skimming along the caps of the billows, or shooting with its white wing up into the dark blue sky. Not a sail was in sight. Our canvass was spread in clouds above us, every thing on board was taut and neat, and the sailors gathered forward in groups, were laughing gaily as they recounted old yarns, and looked forward to a speedy prize. All around seemed bright. The breeze sang pleasantly through the cordage, the sunshine played merrily upon the waters, and the joyous feeling that always follows a storm, pervaded every one on board.

As I stood upon the quarter-deck looking idly upon the horizon, the events of the last night recurred to me as the incidents of a dream. I recalled the stirring excitement, the lost foretop-man, the conversation with the old man, the singular appearance of the strange sail, and its mysterious disappearance, until it seemed as if I stood in a magic circle, where all these shadowy incidents came and went before me like the figures in a panorama. I tried to believe them imaginary, but there was the lost mast;—and poor Jack Danson had not answered to his name that morning. The strange sail still remained unexplained. All was doubt, while one or two of my brother mids waggishly charged me with being "fou," and seeing double. The sailors, however,—at least such as heard of it, had but one mind on the subject, and long before the morning watch was up they had come to the conclusion that the strange sail on our bow was nothing more nor less than The Flying Dutchman, or at least one of the smaller craft of that old chap, Davy Jones.

By sunset the sea was well down, the breeze had fallen moderately, and with all sail set we were running for ——, the nearest neutral port, in order to refit. The next morning we were already logged many a good knot, and the men were about being piped to breakfast, when the look-out reported a strange sail to windward.

"Is the coffee ready?" asked the Commodore.

"It's in the coppers, sir, just ready to be served out."

"Very well, then delay it a while,—how does the sail look now?" said he, hailing the look-out.

"She's an armed schooner, I judge, sir, coming down afore the wind, with every thing drawing, sir."

"Let the ship be hauled close, then, Mr. Jackson," said the Commodore, turning to the officer of the deck, "put on as much more as she will carry, and then pipe the men to breakfast, by that time we shall be able to make something more out of her."

The shrill whistle of the boatswain summoned the men to their duty, the sails were close-hauled, the helm put hard down, and in a few minutes, we were beating right into the wind's eye, and flinging the spray to the fore-mast yard arm, as we thumped against the waters.

"How does she bear now," said the old veteran, re-appearing on deck, and as he said so he lifted his glass for a moment to his eye. "Ah, Mr. Jackson, it's not a prize yet—it's the gallant little STORM."

"So it is, sir," answered the lieutenant, as he took the glass from his eye. "I might as well then not open the magazine."

"Hardly, sir," said the Commodore with a smile, "but hoist the signal to communicate. Let her come to under our lee."

The gun was fired, the signal fluttered aloft, and directly the answering bunting shot up to the mast head of the trim little craft to windward, and soon afterward she shifted her course a point or two and stealing swiftly along, like some aerial spirit of the deep, glided across our bows, wore round, and seemingly without mortal agency,—for her decks were almost bare,—came up into the wind until her sails were shaking. A moment after, a boat shot from her sides, danced a few minutes on the waters, and directly after her captain ascended our side and was ushered into the cabin.

"Dick Danforth!"

"Harry Irvine!"

The personage I thus addressed was a middy from the schooner, and in him I unexpectedly recognised an old schoolmate I had parted with some years before. He was much younger than myself, but we had always been great cronies, and our unexpected meeting was, therefore, full of pleasure to us both. We soon lost ourselves in old times, and I had already got him down into our mess-room, and was bringing out the old jug, when a brother middy poked his head into the room and said,

"Danforth, the skipper's been after you these ten minutes, we've hardly known where you were.—I'll do the agreeable to Mr. Irvine till you come back,—Jamaica or brandy, sir?—push the bottle," and with the easy familiarity of a sailor, he took a seat on the locker, and plunged at once into conversation with his new companion.

Wondering what might be the cause of this sudden inquiry, I hurried from the mess-room, and soon stood in the presence of the aged Commodore. He had been busily engaged with Captain Drew, the commander of the schooner, and the table before them was garnished with a bottle of wine, a few glasses, and strewed with maps, and charts. At my entrance he addressed himself to me. He always went right to the point.

"Mr. Danforth, I have sent for you to offer you the refusal of a cruise with Captain Drew. We are so disabled that we shall have to make the next neutral port, and shall not be able to get to sea for a month at least. Meanwhile, the Guinea Coast will be left wholly free from our Cruizers, unless I despatch THE STORM there. This I have resolved to do. I shall draft fifty men from our crew and add them to yours," said he, turning to Captain Drew, "and with that number you will be able to board the stoutest Indiaman you may meet, beside being strong enough to venture a skirmish with men-of-war of even heavier metal than yourselves. I shall, however, only spare you one of our youngsters, and," turning again to me, "if I have not mistaken your character, Mr. Danforth, it will not be your fault if that one is not you. Is it so?"

It was the very thing I would have wished. I knew amid the crowds of youngsters on board the frigate, there was but little chance for distinction, and less for promotion. Besides, Captain Drew was a daring, chivalrous seaman, and no man could sail with him long without having plenty to do. His little craft was like a forlorn hope, the post of honor and the resort of brave men, and the offer of the Commodore was therefore highly complimentary. Moreover, Harry Irvine and I should be messmates. I at once agreed to go.

"Well then," he continued, "I trust you will ever be as fearless and as watchful as I have found you to be. Remember, your advancement in the profession you have chosen will depend upon yourself, and I have now given you an opportunity by which, if you but do your duty with a tithe of the assiduity which you lately displayed, you cannot fail to distinguish yourself, and perhaps," continued he, smiling, and touching my shoulder, "when we next meet I may congratulate you on having obtained promotion. You will be the oldest midshipman on board, and if you distinguish yourself in some gallant action, it may not be a very hopeless case. Captain, I believe we have done, but a glass of wine before we part."

I felt the tears welling into my eyes, and a quick, choking sensation rising into my throat, at a kindness as unusual as the old man's, and raising the glass to my lips, I hurriedly drained it, and then, to hide my emotions, touched my hat and rushed from the cabin.

"Jimmy, Dick, what 'll you take for your place?" said one mid of the crowd gathered around me as I packed up my traps.

"Split my timbers, as the bo'sain says," echoed another, "but you 're in luck."

"Death's heads and cross-bones!" laughed a wit, "I think I see you already gazetted for promotion into the other world. Captain Drew, takes men to heaven deucedly fast."

"A dollar that he's a swab in a year."

"Well, lads," said I, as they announced the boat, "we've had a merry cruise together, let's have a merry parting!" and I poured out a brimmer. [illegible] the jug?

"The moon—God bless it!" said I.

"Danforth!" roared my companions in reply, "drink it down, hurrah!"

And so we parted.

"All hands make sail," shouted Captain Drew, as he reached the deck of The Storm, "bring her up into the wind, and now for Africa,"—and before a quarter of an hour had elapsed, we were dashing into the wind's eye, and leaving the frigate rapidly to leeward. Her course was soon altered, and she was seen with all her canvass aloft, standing away on the larboard tack, and flitting along on the distant waves, like some huge water-fowl skimming the waters. Long before noon she was well down on the horizon.

THE UNWILLING BRIDE.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

The joy-bells are ringing—oh come to the church;
We shall see the bride pass, if we stand in the porch;
The bridegroom is wealthy; how brightly arrayed
Are the menials who wait on the gay cavalcade:
The steeds with the chariot prancing along,
And the peasants advancing with music and song.

Now comes the procession: the bridesmaids are there,
With robes, and with ribbons, and wreaths in their hair;
Yon feeble old knight the bride's father must be,
And now, walking proudly, her mother we see;
A pale girl in tears slowly moves by her side;
But where is the bridegroom, and where is the bride?

They kneel round the altar,—the organ has ceased,
And the hands of the lovers are joined by the priest,
That bond—which death only can sever again!
Which proves ever life's greatest blessing or bane!
A bridal like this is a sorrowful sight;
See! the pale girl is bride to the feeble old knight.

Her arm on her husband's arm passively lies,
And closely she draws her rich veil o'er her eyes;
Her friends throng around her with accents of love;
She speaks not—her pale lips inaudible move,
Her equipage waits—she is placed by the side
Of her sad companion—a sorrowing bride!

Again the bells ring, and the moment is come
For the young heart's worst pang, the last look of home!
They pass from the village—how eagerly still
She turns and looks back from the brow of the hill!
She sees the white cottage—the garden she made;
And she thinks of her lover—abandoned—betrayed!

But who, with arms folded, hath lingered so long
To watch the procession, apart from the throng?
'Tis he! the forsaken! The false one is gone—
He turns to his desolate dwelling alone;
But happier there, than the doom that awaits
The bride who must smile on a being she hates!

A SKETCH OF LORD BROUGHAM HIMSELF.

That old gentleman in the lawn sleeves, who is upon his legs and speaking—although we cannot at this distance, hear a word he utters—is the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is coming to an end at last. I see by Brougham's restlessness that he has long been impatient, and that he wants to speak himself. Hark! there he is. Now listen to the orator. He commences in a low and measured tone, and the first thing that strikes you is his broad and northern dialect; he appears for a moment to hesitate, to doubt whether he did right to get up, and whether he had not better sit down. He is now stating propositions that few people think of denying, but which certainly do not appear to have the most remote relation to the question or to each other. Let us observe him awhile as he proceeds. Mark his long and parenthetical sentences, yet how clear his enunciation makes them. Now you see what the disjointed, irrelevant, and apparently unconnected propositions with which he commenced, meant; they are now the beams of his argument; how adroitly he connects them—how easily he fills in the intervening spaces—how he surprises you by the exquisite appropriateness to the very point you had deemed the most irrelevant; he grows warm as he proceeds, carries you on with him—not because he is Lord Brougham—because he is a great orator, for that you do not feel—but because you cannot help it; because you sympathise, not with him, but with his cause. He concludes, and he resumes his seat, but not with any air of complacency, rather as though he was thoroughly unrelieved, and had that within his breast which yet struggled for a vent. * * *

Wait one moment, most critical strangers; you have seen the lion only in his quiet mood. While you have been criticising, a prosy old nobleman in the further corner, has been declaring that Lord Brougham's measure is no better than it ought to be, and that he himself is not much better than his measure. His grace spoke so low that I could not hear one word he said, but I could read it all in Brougham's eye. Another—and other—and another; and from all sides of the house, thick and fast, comes raillery at the new proposition. Like most persons who love to inflict torment upon others, Brougham is especially tender himself. That foolish looking fellow with the curls has absolutely touched him; see, now, how Brougham looks when he is goaded. Make way, good people the bull is coming; chained or loose, right or wrong, he can stand it no longer; with one lashing bound, he clears every obstacle, and there he is, with tail erect, and head depressed, snorting in the middle of the arena. Now you see Brougham: his eyes appear to flash—the gathering of the brows is like the gathering of thunder-clouds—his dark-grey hair appears rigid with the compressed energy of his fury—his arm is raised—his voice is high! There is the commencement of the storm—his first sentence pushes into the subject. Hark at the coarse and stunning piece of contemptuous mockery with which he begins. See how the whipster peer, who was lately so flippant, shrinks within himself—how horrified he looks, with what dreadful interest he appears to hang upon the lips of his castigator, in an agony of expectation as to what the next moment may bring forth. And look at the other peers who sit around; whether Brougham speaks of them as "his noble friends," or as "the noble lords," they appear marvellously uncomfortable if they find his name in their mouths; for Brougham is in full tilt—he has sarcasm on his tongue, and bile in his heart—he is talking Greek fire, and wherever it falls, upon friend or foe, it sinks deep and leaves its scar; he is like an elephant in Indian battle, trampling down every enemy in his path, while the arrows that are winged from its back, scatter wounds among the distant crowd.

* * * * * * *

Of all the phenomena which strike us when viewing the life of Henry Brougham, perhaps the most wonderful is the intensity of his industry. The literary labors of the man, if it were possible that they could be collected, would form a mass that might put to shame the ponderous labor of Origen, or might vie with those of the most voluminous of the fathers whose works found too honorable a fate in warming the baths of Alexandria.

ONE OF THE 'THE BEAUTIFUL WOMEN OF PARIS.'

For some time past a work has been published in numbers under the rather odd title of "La Belles Femmes de Paris." A biographical article is annexed to the portrait of the happy woman who is deemed worthy of shining in the collection. Women of all classes, the queens of the shops especially, are singularly delighted at being introduced into the gallant museum, in company with Italian Princesses, Spanish Countesses, and the great ladies of our all-powerful financial aristocracy.

The other day, in the morning, Madame B——, whose throne stands in one of the most splendid shops in the Rue de la Paix, received the visit of a very polite and good-looking young gentleman, whose manners were particularly elegant. He had under his arm a little portfolio of the finest green morocco, which, with his long hair and pointed beard, proclaimed the artist. "Madame," said the youth, "I am a painter, and in that capacity commissioned to contribute some portraits to the collection 'des Belles Femmes de Paris.' I am come to ask you, Madame, to favor me with a sitting." Upon this proposal the lady lowered her eyes, and affectedly replied that the editors were very indulgent to think of her; that she could ascribe their notice of her but to gallantry; that she was not pretty enough to deserve the intended honor; that —— in short, amidst her abundant expressions of modesty and humility, shone unbounded delight. After some further negotiation, the handsome shopkeeper went up to her apartment with the young artist, cast a glance at her mirror, set her hair in proper order, put on a necklace, ear-rings and bracelets, seated herself, and suffered her drapery to be tastefully adjusted by the painter, who proceeded to his task. Half an hour after, he rose, and courteously observing that he had, perhaps, tired his lovely model, announced his return next day at the same hour. On Madame B—— begging to look at his sketch, he politely apologised, urging that as yet there was no likeness, but that on the following day it would be forthcoming. A short chat ensued. The artist examined, en connoisseur, several pictures ornamenting the bedroom, stopping long before the chimney-piece, over which hung, among other pretty things, various miniatures, which he took down, put back, praised, and pronounced charming. His inspection being concluded, he made a most graceful bow, and left the fair lady in one of those ecstacies which the female heart likes so well.

At night, when Madame B——, freed from commercial labor so unworthy of one of the "Belles Femmes de Paris," returned to her bedroom to enjoy her triumph, she happened to move to her chimney-piece to wind up her darling watch; but the watch happened to have vanished along with the gold chain which usually connected it with her snow-white neck, and both fugitives were soon followed by the splendid dream, and all the joy anticipated from a woman's brightest victory. As nobody had entered the room, of which she always kept the key about her person, Madame B—— concluded, with more shrewdness than she had displayed in the morning, that the gallant young gentleman was a thief, the sketch of her portrait a chimera, and that there was some inconvenience in being one of "The Beautiful Women of Paris."—Paris paper.

Luther and the Devil.—We are told that when Luther was busy on his version of the Psalms, the devil came to trouble him, but the reformer flung his inkstand at him, and the fiend flew away. Now-a-days, it is not the devil that gets bespattered with ink, but worthy men and good citizens.

Truth and Falsehood.—Falsehood flies swift as the wind, and Truth creeps behind her at a snail's pace. But Falsehood makes so many twistings and turnings, that Truth, keeping steadily on, looking neither to the right nor the left, overtakes her before long.

The Wise Men of Greece.—All Greece, populous, refined and cultivated as it was, could boast of but seven wise men; now-a-days, you can find as many as that in every coffee-room.

[illegible] is daily effecting some of the most astonishing and wonderful cures that have ever been known. All who have ever used it for Asthma, Coughs, Spitting of Blood, Hooping Cough, Croup or Hives, Consumption, Chronic Pleurisy, Hoarseness, Pain and Soreness of the Breast, difficulty of Breathing, and every other disease of the LUNGS and BREAST, can and do attest to its usefulness. BRONCHITIS, a disease which is annually sweeping thousands upon thousands to a premature grave, under the mistaken name of CONSUMPTION, is always cured by it. The usual symptoms of this disease (Bronchitis) are Cough, Soreness of the Lungs or Throat, Hoarseness, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, Hectic Fever, a spitting up of Phlegm or matter, and sometimes blood. It is an inflammation of the fine skin which lines the inside of the whole of the wind tubes or air vessels, which run through every part of the Lungs. This Expectorant immediately suppresses the Cough, Pain, Inflammation, Fever and Difficulty of Breathing, and produces a free and easy Expectoration, and a cure is soon effected.

It always cures ASTHMA—two or three large doses will cure the CROUP or HIVES of Children, in from fifteen minutes to an hour's time. It immediately subdues the violence of WHOOPING COUGH, and effects a speedy cure. Hundreds who have been given up by their physicians as incurable with "CONSUMPTION," have been restored to perfect health by it.

REV. JONATHAN GOING, D. D. President of Granville College, Ohio, says—"he was laboring under a severe cold, cough and hoarseness, and that his difficulty of breathing was so great that he felt himself in imminent danger of immediate suffocation, but was perfectly cured by using this Expectorant."—Mrs. Dilks, of Salem, N. J. was cured of Asthma of twenty years standing, by using two bottles of this medicine.—Mrs. Ward, also, of Salem, was cured of the same complaint by one bottle.—A young lady, also of Salem, who was believed by her friends to be far gone with Consumption, was perfectly restored by three bottles.—Dr. Hamilton, of St. James, South Carolina, was greatly affected by a cough, hoarseness and soreness of the lungs, and on using a bottle of this medicine, found permanent relief.

The following certificate is from a practising Physician, and a much respected Clergyman of the Methodist Society, dated Modest Town, Va. August 27, 1838.

Dr. Jayne—Dear Sir—I have been using your Expectorant, extensively, in my practice, for the last six months, and for all attacks of colds, inflammation of the lungs, consumption, asthma, pain and weakness of the breast, it is decidedly the best medicine I have ever tried. Very respectfully, yours,
E. W. WILLIAMS, M. D.

Certificate from the Rev. Dr. Babcock, late President of Waterville College, Maine.

"From intimate personal acquaintance with Dr. D. Jayne, a regular student of the Medical University of Pennsylvania, and an experienced, successful practitioner of medicine, I was prepared to appreciate the numerous testimonials in favor of his different medical preparations, much more highly than the great majority of those which are extensively eulogised. On trial of them, in my own family, and some of them personally, I have more than realized their favorable anticipations. They are what they profess to be—not quack nostrums—but skilfully prepared antidotes for some of the most afflictive of human diseases. I know that they are highly esteemed, and frequently prescribed, by some of the most respectable of the regular practitioners of medicine in this city and elsewhere, and I do not hesitate to commend them as a valuable addition to our materia medica, and a safe, and in all cases eminently useful remedy for the diseased."

The Rev. C. C. P. Crosby, late Editor of the American Baptist, writes—
NEW YORK, June 12, 1839.

To Dr. Jayne.—Dear Sir—I have made use of your Expectorant, personally and in my family, for the last six years, with great benefit. Indeed, I may consider my life prolonged by the use of this valuable medicine, under the blessing of God, for several years. I may say almost as much in the case of my wife, and also of the Rev. Mr. Tinson, of the Island of Jamaica. For all cases of cough, inflammation of the chest, lungs, and throat, I do most unhesitatingly recommend this as the best medicine I have ever tried. My earnest wish is, that others afflicted as I have been, may experience the same relief which I am persuaded they will, by using your Expectorant.
C. C. P. CROSBY.

Extract of a certificate from the Rev. Mr. Bradford.

Dr. Jayne—Dear Sir—My child, owing to exposure when recently coming up the Ohio, was attacked by that horrible malady, CROUP. We landed in the night at Beaver Point, and when our fears were alarmed by her hoarse, sepulchral cough which was the forerunner of death, gave her a tea-spoonful of the "EXPECTORANT," a bottle of which you presented me with when in Philadelphia, and applied some liniment to the throat and breast, and before many minutes the hoarseness was gone, the child breathed freely and slept sweetly. Owing to these circumstances it cannot be wondered at why I have so high an opinion of Dr. Jayne's medicine, and why I advise every family to keep it on hand, ready for any emergency.
Respectfully yours,
ARTHUR B. BRADFORD,
Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Darlington, Pa.

MORUS MULTICAULIS. 40,000 Morus Multicaulis, fine and large, for sale in lots to suit purchasers, at the agency, by F. WOOLMAN, sept 14—tf Burlington, New Jersey.

THE SUNFLOWER LEAF, A SUBSTITUTE FOR TOBACCO. It has long been well known that the Sunflower (Helianthus) is profitable to the cultivator, the seed producing an oil equal if not superior to olive oil, for the table or druggist, and finds a ready sale in market at a greater price than the flaxseed oil; but the medicinal virtues of the leaf—like many other discoveries that add to the comfort of man, was entirely accidental—an individual laboring under an Asthmatic complaint, made use of the leaf in the way of smoking, having prepared the leaf and made into segars like those made from tobacco, from the use of which he received instantaneous relief, and in every case of coughs, colds, or oppression of the chest, where the segars made of the Sunflower leaf have been used they have given relief.

In Botany, the medicinal virtues of the leaf are pectoral and expectorant are well established. Its healing qualities to the breast and lungs, contrast strongly with those of tobacco, which possess none of those properties, but on the contrary is harsh, acid, bitter, and stimulating, and when used in the way of smoking, always proves more or less injurious to those who use it, and more especially in consumptive habits. Hence the Patentees of the Sunflower and Rhubarb Segars, flatter themselves that if they can succeed in introducing a substitute for tobacco, a poisonous plant, whose action upon the human system is deleterious, for one which is mild and soothing and possessing medical properties of a high order, they will confer a benefit not only to individual sufferers who are suffering from the practice of an inveterate habit, but upon invalids who may be induced to give the Sunflower Segar a trial. The Sunflower is a plant of vigorous growth, and may be cultivated in almost any soil, and has been extensively cultivated in some of the Southern States for the oil alone; but when the value of the leaf shall be added to the oil there is little doubt that in a short time the culture of the Sunflower will be found quite as profitable as the cotton crops of the South; and much more so than tobacco—for being a certain crop—and adapted to almost every variety of soil and climate, the planter will find it his interest to invest his capital and labor in the culture of a plant that will in a short time supersede the use of tobacco in the way of smoking.

The subscribers, Patentees of the Sunflower and Rhubarb Segars, hold a number of original certificates, among which are the following:

I do hereby certify that through inclemency of the weather, my throat had become so hoarse that I could not make myself understood, after having smoked one of the Sunflower Segars, in thirty minutes I could converse with ease.
GEORGE ROLLER.

The following list of names are on similar certificates: Dr. Winters, David S. Groff, John Lutz, Amos [illegible], David Hahn, John Johns, Samuel Stauffer, Amos [illegible], Capt. Samuel D. Miller, Henry Stauffenberger.

The subscribers have now on hand a small lot of segars from their last year's stock, and have a considerable crop under their immediate cultivation, which with the arrangements they will be enabled to meet all orders received, after the first of December next. In introducing the above Segars, they ask the influence of a liberal public, which is always ready when agriculture and science are the motto; by that time they will be enabled to furnish their friends and the public with a superior article of segars.

All letters, orders for samples at present, or correspondence to contract for a right of making in any state or section of the Union, (not yet contracted for, when post paid, and directed to the subscribers, Marietta, Pennsylvania, will receive proper attention.

N. B. Country editors, inserting the above three times and sending one copy to the subscribers, will be entitled to one box of segars.

COUGH, ASTHMA, SPITTING OF BLOOD, &c. [illegible] Years Standing, cured by DR. JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT!
PHILADELPHIA, August [illegible]

MR. ATKINSON—Dear Sir: A few weeks ago I read in your paper, an account of the surprising effects of JAYNE'S CARMINATIVE, in restoring a great number of passengers on board a Mississippi steamboat, to perfect health who were affected with Bowel Complaint. I am glad to see you notice it so kindly; you may rest assured it deserves the praise bestowed upon it. The benefit I have received from this medicine, more especially the EXPECTORANT, induces me to state my case in [illegible] for the benefit of those who are afflicted in the same way. It has been my misfortune, sir, to labor under a cough and asthmatical oppression for more than half a century. When a soldier in the American camp in 1777, I, with many others, (owing to great exposure) had a violent attack of disease of the Lungs, by which I was disabled from duty for a long time. Since that period until recently, I have never been free from a violent Cough and difficulty of breathing. Year after year I have expectorated over a gill a day; often much more, and at times mixed with blood. For months together, night after night, I have had to sit or be bolstered up to obtain breath. The weakness and debility caused by such constant expectoration, frequently brought me to a state bordering on death. It has been a matter of astonishment to my family and friends, that I am here to write to you. I have had skilful physicians to attend me, and every thing done that was thought likely to give relief, without any beneficial effect. Last winter I had another severe attack of Inflammation of the Lungs, which I fully expected would be the last. I then considered my case as past the aid of medicine, when I was persuaded to call on Doctor Jayne. With the assistance of Divine Providence, through him, I was once more raised from my bed, but the coughing and wheezing continued night and day. He advised me to use his Expectorant. I did so, with a strong hope that, as it had cured many of my acquaintances of various diseases of the Lungs, it might at least mitigate my sufferings. Need I say how gratified I felt? IT HAS EFFECTUALLY CURED ME. As soon as I commenced taking it, I found it to relieve me, and I began to breathe with more freedom. My expectoration became more easy, and my cough soon left me. I now feel as well as ever I did in my life, and am better than I have been for the last SIXTY YEARS. Last summer, I spit a great deal of blood; now, thank God, I am perfectly cured. Now, Sir, after suffering so long, and finding at last such signal relief from Dr. Jayne's Expectorant, I feel anxious to inform my fellow citizens where relief may be had. If you think this worthy a place in your paper, you will oblige me by inserting it.
